RECORDS OF THE SOCIAL AND ECONOMIC HISTORY OF ENGLAND AND WALES

ENGLAND possesses the most remarkable set of records of economic and social history in the world. Beginning with the Domesday Survey, that unique description of eleventh-century society, we get a continuous series of cartularies, extents, ministers' accounts, terriers, revenue-rolls, agricultural, industrial, and commercial documents of all kinds, ranging to the present time. Unfortunately only a comparatively small portion of them has been published or even described. The importance of such publications as those of the Abingdon, Gloucester, Ramsey Cartularies in the Rolls Series, the Domesday of St. Paul's, the Black Book of Peterborough, the Cartulary of Battle Abbey in the Camden Series, brings forcibly home the necessity of rendering accessible to the public a vast store of similar documents. There is at present no Society able to proceed with such work in a systematic manner worthy of its national and scientific importance. The publications of the Rolls Series have been discontinued; the Royal Historical Society, which has taken over the Camden Series, has to divide its energies among many subjects; local societies bring from time to time welcome contributions, but these are scattered and difficult of access, and appear more or less accidentally without any systematic co-ordination. There is surely a field here for a great national undertaking, which at the same time would be highly appreciated by scholars abroad, and the British Academy has decided to make an attempt to call forth and organize efforts in this direction. With this view a Committee has been formed consisting of Viscount Bryce (President of the Academy), Professor P. Vinogradoff as director of publications, Archdeacon Cunningham, Professor C. H. Firth, Professor Gollancz (Secretary of the Academy), Dr. R. L. Poole, Dr. G. W. Prothero, Sir John Rhŷs, Professor Tout, and Sir George Warner. A grant in aid has been voted by Parliament on the proposal of the Lords Commissioners of His Majesty's Treasury towards the expenses of the publication of the Series. It is proposed, as far as possible, to issue three volumes every two years; and a series of records of social and economic history has been taken in hand. The early volumes will be devoted principally to agrarian conditions and rural society in the Middle Ages, but attention will also be paid in subsequent volumes to industry and commerce.

It is hoped that this undertaking will find sympathy and support among the students of English history, and will help to reconstitute the background of the work and wealth of the nation, without which the events of its life can neither be rightly understood nor judged.

RECORDS OF THE SOCIAL AND ECONOMIC HISTORY OF ENGLAND AND WALES

Vol. I. Survey of the Honour of Denbigh, A.D. 1334, published from a MS. given by the late Dr. Seebohm to the Maitland Library in Oxford, edited by Professor P. Vinogradoff and Mr. Frank Morgan, M.A., of Keble College, Oxford; 8vo, 16/-.

THE FOLLOWING VOLUMES ARE IN COURSE OF PREPARATION:

II. The Black Book of St. Augustine, Canterbury, from a thirteenth-century MS., Cotton Faustina A. I, at the British Museum. Part I, edited by G. J. Turner, M.A., Barrister, of Lincoln's Inn.

III. The Black Book of St. Augustine, Part II, edited by the Rev. H. E. Salter, M.A. An Eleventh-Century Inquisition of St. Augustine's, Canterbury, edited by A. Ballard, M.A., LL.B.

IV. (a) A Feodary of the Templars, A.D. 1185, edited by the late Marquis d'Albon, editor of the Cartulaire des Templiers, and by the Rev. H. E. Salter, M.A.

(b) A Terrier of Fleet, Lincolnshire, from a MS. in the British Museum, edited by Miss N. Neilson, Ph.D., Lecturer at Mount Holyoke College, Mass., U.S.A.

V. Documents illustrative of the Social and Economic History of the Danelaw, from various collections, edited by F. M. Stenton, M.A., Professor at University College, Reading.

VI. A Book of Accounts of Bolton Abbey, Yorkshire, from a MS. in the possession of the Duke of Devonshire, edited by R. J. Whitwell, B.Litt.

PREFACE

THE history of Great Britain rises on a rock-bed of Celtic institutions and customs. Materials which supply information as to this fundamental substratum of British society are certainly of first-rate importance. As it happens, the records of the struggles between the English and the Welsh, which ended in the permanent inclusion of Wales in the English state, contain exceedingly curious information about the social and economic arrangements of the Celtic population. Quite apart from the light which they shed on racial conflicts and contrasts, they elucidate the working of the tribal system more completely than any other documents of European history.

Among such records, the Survey of the Honour of Denbigh, made in 1334, holds the first place in respect of the value, exactitude, and fullness of its contents. It was the privilege of the late Dr. Seebohm to recognize the importance of this document, and to bring it to the notice of the learned by extracts in his Tribal System in Wales;[1] but of course the record itself affords materials for a much more complete representation of Welsh society. Dr. Seebohm was fortunate enough to acquire one of the extant copies of the Survey from Colonel Howard, of Wygfair.

[1] Some extracts from the Survey had been published by J. Williams in Records of Denbigh and its Lordship (Wrexham, 1860), but this work has not been much used for purposes of general history.

A few years before his death, Dr. Seebohm presented this copy to the Maitland Library of Legal and Social History, founded in connexion with the Corpus Chair of Jurisprudence in Oxford. Dr. Seebohm desired that the record should be carefully studied and edited, and in accordance with his wishes this was done by my seminar. I had the good fortune to assemble for the performance of this task an exceptionally strong class, as most of its members had already been engaged in academic or literary work. Mr. F. Morgan, Tutor of Keble College, Oxford, has been my principal collaborator; but the following members of the seminar have taken an active part in preparing the text for publication: Miss E. C. Lodge, Vice-Principal and Lecturer of Lady Margaret Hall, Oxford; Mr. J. A. Todd, B.A., formerly of Balliol College, now Professor in Dalhousie University, Nova Scotia; Miss N. Neilson, Ph.D., Lecturer in Mount Holyoke College, South Hadley, Mass., U.S.A.; Mr. Arthur Jones, M.A., Fellow of Manchester University, now Lecturer in Birkbeck College, London; Miss B. Lees, formerly Lecturer of Somerville College, Oxford; Mr. J. R. H. Weaver, M.A., Fellow and Lecturer of Trinity College, Oxford; Mr. R. J. Whitwell, B.Litt., of Oxford; and Mr. F. M. Powicke, Fellow of Merton College, Oxford, now Professor in the University of Belfast. Papers contributed to the seminar have formed the basis or starting-point of sections of the Introduction. In this way the chapter 'Woods and Waste' has been prepared by Miss Lodge, 'Agriculture' by Mr. Todd, 'Rents and Services' by Miss Neilson, 'Officers and Agents' by Mr. Jones, 'The Unfree' by Miss Lees, 'English Tenures' by Mr. Weaver, 'Urban Population' by Mr. Whitwell.

While the book was in the press I had to leave England for India for a stay of several months, and unfortunately Mr. Morgan fell ill. In these circumstances Mr. Weaver stepped into the breach and helped to pass the volume through the press; it is to his energy and industry that we owe the publication of the Survey within the appointed time.

I must not forget to express thanks to Miss Lees for performing the laborious task of compiling the Index Personarum. It was decided on consideration to insert in this index only the names of the head-men of the Welsh holdings, as the inclusion of all the Welsh names mentioned would have rendered it unmanageable and swelled the book to an unreasonable size.

INTRODUCTION

SKETCH OF THE HISTORY OF THE HONOUR OF DENBIGH

THE history of the territory comprised in the Extent of Denbigh is scanty prior to the time of Henry de Lacy, Earl of Lincoln. We know that it formed part of the four cantreds of Perfeddwlad and shared their varying fortunes. We know[1] that the defeat of Gruffyd ap Llewelyn by Harold Godwinson led to a great extension westwards of the limits of England, and that the Palatine County of Chester included in 1086 the whole of modern Flintshire and the greater part of modern Denbighshire.

In 1240 Llewelyn the Great died, and was succeeded by his second son, David, who died in 1246. He was succeeded by the sons of his elder brother Gruffyd, who had met his death in an attempted escape from the Tower in 1244.

In 1255 there broke out a fatal quarrel between the three Welsh princes. 'In those days, by the instigation of the devil, a great dissension was engendered between the sons of Gruffyd, son of Llywelyn, viz. Owain the Red and David on the one side and Llywelyn on the other side.' As the result of a battle at Bryn Derwin Owain the Red was captured and David fled, their territories being taken by Llewelyn.[2]

It was not an auspicious moment for quarrelling, for in that very year King Henry endowed Prince Edward on his marriage with the County of Chester cum tota terra quam habuit rex in Wallia, and in 1256 Edward came to take a survey of his castles and lands in Gwynedd. Edward, however, was too fully occupied with the troubles in England to take much part in the war on the Marches, in which Llewelyn met with much success. In 1263 he took the castles of Diserth and Deganwy and over-ran the four cantreds, but once more David revolted; 'And then, by the instigation of the devil, David forsook the society of his brother Llewelyn and went to England with some of his confederates.'[1] It was apparently on this occasion that Prince Edward granted to David 'the whole land of Diffrencloyt and Rowennok, to hold until he shall have obtained all his inheritance as well beyond the water of Conway as elsewhere in North Wales, except the four cantreds of Pervethelath'.[2] The Treaty of Montgomery in 1267 was a great success for Llewelyn; he obtained the Principality on condition of homage, he was to receive the homage of the Welsh barons and the four cantreds were recognized as his; but David was restored to his lands.

In 1274 there were fresh troubles between Llewelyn and Gwenwynwyn of Powys, and in 1276 Edward set on foot three large expeditions against Wales, the central under the leadership of Henry de Lacy and Roger Mortimer. David was again on the king's side.[3] Edward promised that in the event of his conquering Llewelyn, he would restore to David and Owain his brother a moiety of the whole of Snowdon and the Lleyn and a moiety of Anglesey and Pentlyn, or if the king took the whole of Anglesey, the whole of Snowdon and Pentlyn. Edward's expedition was successful, and Llewelyn was compelled to sign the Treaty of Conway, by which Edward recovered the four cantreds and made provision for David as he had promised. David, however, was not satisfied with his position and drew up a long list of grievances, and finally urged Llewelyn into the last struggle for independence. He himself took the lead in a successful attack on the castle of Hawarden.

Edward made deliberate preparations for a final conquest. He was at Denbigh from October 20 to November 5, 1282, and granted to Reginald de Grey the castle of Ruthyn, the cantred of Deffrencloyt, and the lands of Wentheliana de Lascy.[4] Llewelyn met his death at Orewyn Bridge on December 10; David held out for a few months in the wilds of Snowdon, but was betrayed, tried as a traitor, and hanged on December 3, 1283. Meanwhile his two sons had been handed over by Henry de Lacy and Reginald de Grey to Richard de Boys on July 15;[1] his and Llewelyn's daughters became nuns.[2] Reginald de Grey had been granted part of the spoil, but prior to October 8, 1283,[3] we find that Henry de Lacy had been granted the commote of Creudyn and the land of Waynol in the cantred of Roos. Apparently he had received the lordship of Denbigh, for in the next year[4] he is stocking his park of Denbigh with deer from the king's forest of La Mare, and endowing with 42 marks seven chaplains to celebrate divine service in his chapel there.[5] On August 28, 1290, he granted his burgesses of Denbigh a charter,[6] and obtained for them from the king exemption from toll, stallage, paiage, pavage, murage, pontage and passage in Wales and in the counties of Chester, Stafford, Salop, Gloucester, Worcester and Hereford.[7]

Henry de Lacy, Earl of Lincoln, died February 5, 1311; a writ of inquisition post mortem was issued February 6, 1311, the inquiry taking place in the ensuing summer.[8] He left a widow, Joan, who was duly assigned her dower,[9] and a daughter, Alesia, married to Thomas, Earl of Lancaster, who seem to have had some difficulty in securing their inheritance.[10] However, on July 17 Thomas did homage,[11] and on September 20 Roger Mortimer was ordered as Justice of Wales to give him seisin and all issues since July 1.[12]

Thomas of Lancaster was executed at Pontefract March 23, 1322, but already on January 23 one John de Morton had been ordered to make an inventory of the castles of Denbigh and Kevenethes.[13] On March 28[14] Simon de Balderston and Henry de Athelardestre were ordered to audit the accounts, and on April 13[15] William Gentyl, late sheriff of Lancaster, and William de Monte, steward of Denbigh, were ordered to meet them. On June 27 Alesia surrendered to the king all her rights in Denbigh.[1]

On July 9, 1322,[2] 'the castle and honour of Denbigh, the cantreds of Ros and Royewynok, and the commote of Dynmael' were granted to Hugh le Despencer, Earl of Winchester. On July 20[3] this was followed by a grant of 'the corn, hay, grass, animals and all goods' in the foregoing and other lands: on August 4[4] the grant was extended to include the issues from the time of the estate being taken into the king's hands.[5] In April of this year the king had granted to Robert de Glasham the forfeited lands of Yerward de la Chaumbre to the value of £10 yearly, but on December 30[6] Robert became by virtue of the king's writ a tenant of Hugh le Despencer. On April 12, 1323,[7] the new lord of the 'lands of Dynbegh, Rowynnok, and Keinmerich' was ordered to array 500 footmen, and on May 5[8] the treasurer, barons, and chamberlains of the Exchequer were ordered to pay the wages. On March 15, 1324, the charter to the inhabitants of Denbigh, originally granted by Henry de Lacy, was inspected and confirmed.[9] On February 11, 1325,[10] a pardon was granted to Hugh le Despencer for acquiring in fee from Alesia, Countess of Lincoln and Salisbury, among others 'the castle and manor of Dynebegh and the cantreds of Ros, Rowennok, and Kaymer, co. Salop . . . held in chief, and entering therin without license'; and licence was granted for him to retain the same.

Hugh Despencer fell with Edward II, and was hanged at Bristol on October 27, 1326. His Denbigh tenants had apparently been complaining of his arbitrary restriction of their rights of hunting, for on May 7, 1327,[11] a commission of oyer and terminer was issued to inquire into the matter. On February 25, 1328,[12] a confirmation was granted to 'Thomas de Pontefracto, grantee in fee simple from Richard le Keu, of a grant by Henry de Lacy, formerly Earl of Lincoln, Constable of Chester and Meanwhile, on December 15, 1326, the custody of the castle was granted to Roger Mortimer of Wigmore, and on September 13, 1327, he was given the castle in pursuance of a promise by Edward to grant him lands, &c., to the value of £1,000 yearly.[1] On November 19, 1328,[2] Roger was granted licence 'to make a pond and construct a water-mill on the Cluyd, and attach the latter to the king's land of Teghengle in the town of Lewenny, in the place of one situated in his own demesne, between Teghengle and Dynebegh, carried away by a flood'. On August 24, 1330,[3] a commission was granted to Roger Mortimer to search for concealed goods of Edmund, Earl of Arundel, and Hugh Despencer, and to recover the same for the king.

But on November 29, 1330, Roger Mortimer was hanged.[4] Early in the new year Denbigh and its appurtenances was granted to William de Montacute,[5] and on January 23, [4] An order to the Keeper of the Castle of Denbigh on December 10 (Cal. Close Rolls) speaks of the castle and lands being in the king's hands. In Ministers' Accounts, 1182, there is an account of the Lordship of Denbigh worthy of comparison with the present Extent.

[5] 'Whereas the prelates, magnates and great men of the realm in parliament at Westminster assembled have petitioned the king to have due regard to the 1331,[1] he was given all ferms and rents due at the previous Michaelmas term. On July 24, 1332, he was commissioned[2] to recover for the king all debts due to Roger Mortimer in 'the lordship of Ros and Rywynok, the manor and honor of Dynbegh in the cantreds of Ros, Rywynok, and Kaermer, and the commote of Dynmael in Wales'. On September 20[3] he was granted these same debts. On October 27[4] the Denbigh charter was once more confirmed, and the exemption from tolls, &c., was made to extend to the whole realm. On September 21, 1332,[5] there was a confirmation of a grant to William Curteys for a rent of a rose at Midsummer of 140 acres of land in Segreyt and Astrot Canon, and of the release by the same of all his right therein. On March 30, 1333,[6] William de Montacute was ordered to send 300 well-armed men to the king at Newcastle-upon-Tyne. On November 26, 1337,[7] there was an exemplification of two documents: (1) a release of all her rights in Denbigh, &c., by Alicia, wife of Thomas of Lancaster, to Edward II; (2) a grant of the reversion of all rights which Joan, widow of Henry de Lacy, had in Denbigh Castle, &c.

honour of William de Monte Acuto, to whom the king revealed his secret design touching the arrest of Roger de Mortuo Mari late Earl of March, and his accomplices, and who was strenuous therein and preserved the tranquillity and peace of the realm; which Roger had broken out into sedition and enmity against King Edward II and also against the king and Philippa his consort and Edward, Earl of Chester, his son, and certain magnates of the royal family, procuring the death of King Edward II and the annihilation of the position (status) of the king, his consort and his son; and whereas the king made answer to the said petition by enjoining that the said prelates and magnates should inform him as to the value and magnitude of the said reward, who upon deliberation replied that £1,000 of land ought to be provided for the said William in fee, mentioning the castle, town, manor and honour of Dynbegh, the cantreds of Ros, Reywynok, and Kaermar, and the commote of Dynmael in Wales, which the said Roger held of the king's gift, and which Alice late the wife of Thomas late earl of Lancaster, daughter and heir of Henry late Earl of Lincoln, while sole, by her writing quitclaimed to King Edward II, to the value of 1,000 marks by the year; wherefore the king considering the aforesaid matters has given to the said William the said castle and lands as aforesaid to be held by him and the lawful heirs of his body, with all appurtenances, from the king and the other chief lords of the fees by the services due therefrom to the value of 1,000 marks in part satisfaction of the £1,000 aforesaid; with reversion to the king and his heirs' . . ., Charter Roll, Jan. 18, 1331; cf. *Cal. 12, 1344,[1] a commission was issued to Hugh de Berwick to take into the king's custody the castle and town of Denbigh, &c., because the heir was not of age. But on April 30 [2] he was ordered not to interfere, as the king had ascertained by inquisition that Denbigh was held by knight-service of the Prince of Wales; yet in October, 1353,[3] William de Montacute did homage to the king for the barony of Denbigh with the consent of the Prince of Wales.

A dispute, however, now began for the ownership of Denbigh, &c., between William de Montacute and Roger Mortimer, Earl of March, who claimed on the ground that his father's sentence had been declared null and void. William pleaded the king's grant of January 18, 1331, the ratification of April 24, 12 Edward III, and the promise to make good the grant and a further confirmation of May 1, 15 Edward III.[4] Here for the time the calendars desert us, but in the next reign we find the Honour of Denbigh in the hands of the Mortimer family.

KINDREDS AND VILLAGES

The Survey of the Honour of Denbigh gives us a picture of the tenurial condition in 1334 of that part of the County of Denbigh which lies to the north and west of the River Clywedog. In addition we get a sketch of the condition of affairs tempore Principum, i. e. prior to the conquest of Wales by Edward I. The Survey therefore is particularly valuable in its description of the greater part of a Welsh county at two distinct but not distant periods, and for the light it throws on the effect of the conquest and the extent to which Welsh priodarii were replaced by English tenants; it also gives glimpses of the transition from a pastoral to an agricultural condition, from a tribal to a tenurial basis. The Survey describes some eighty vills with their dependent hamlets, four manors—Kilforn, Denbigh, Astret Oweyn, and Dynorbyn Vaur, one castle—Denbigh, and four boroughs—Denbigh, Abergele, Llanrwst, and Erethlyn, and possibly the germ of a fifth at Newborough in Lewenny; the whole being worth some £1,200 per annum. The Extent follows the political divisions, and gives an account of the commote of Kaymergh, then of the cantred of Rewaynok (Rhufoniog) with its two commotes of Yssalet and Ughalet, then in due order of the cantred of Roos (Rhos) with its two commotes of Ysdulas and Ughdulas.

The commote of Kaymergh was from its geographical situation most open to English influence, and in it English influence had undoubtedly been at its greatest. We are told that Henry de Lacy, the first holder post conquestum, had created the manor of Kilforn by removing certain of the native tenants from the vills of Astret Canon and Kilforn and providing them with land elsewhere.[1] The account of the commote of Kaymergh belongs to the same historical plane as the Record of Carnarvon properly so called, or perhaps may be still better regarded as akin to the description of Carmarthenshire in the Black Book of St. Davids,[2] while the rest of the Honour stands in 1334 in the same historic plane as Cardiganshire, as described in the Black Book,[3] both being much less affected by English influences. The vills in the commote of Kaymergh contained some 9,230 acres, of which a little more than 3,200 were held tempore Principum by liberi and about 6,030 acres by nativi; by the time of this survey the lord had obtained by escheat or by exchange nearly 4,700 acres, while the liberi still held 1,730 acres and the nativi about 2,800 acres. These figures may be compared with those of other commotes, e. g. the commote of Ughalet comprised about 15,800 acres, of which about 15,100 were held tempore Principum by liberi and only about 700 by nativi; in 1334 the lord had acquired by escheat or exchange 5,800 acres, while the liberi still held 9,500 and the nativi about 500 acres. So in Ysdulas the lord had acquired by escheat or exchange 4,900 acres out of a total of over 13,000, of which about 9,900 acres had been held by liberi and 3,200 by nativi. In neither of these two commotes did the lord's proportion approach the amount which he held in Kaymergh.

In this Extent we get specimens of purely English tenure, such as might be found in the survey of any English manor of that date, except that we do not hear of the normal week-work of the villeins; some instances represent a tenure, which if no longer purely native, affords evidences which make it possible to reconstruct in some measure the conditions of the original Welsh tenure; and there are other examples which show the direct transition from the Welsh to the English. The society described in the Denbigh Survey presents the strongest possible contrast to the English social arrangements of the same time; and yet there are many traits which show that one system could under certain circumstances develop in the direction of the other.

[1] Cf. text below, ff. 1, 13, 23, 33.

[3] Ibid., pp. 196, &c.

Let us begin by noticing the main points of contrast between the two. If we take the Hundred Rolls of Edward I's time as a faithful picture of the ranks and classes of England about 1280, we find that the broad basis of the social pyramid is still, as in the time of Domesday, formed by the great mass of villeins. If we cross over to Denbighshire about 1334, we find that the class designated nativi and corresponding roughly to the English villeins forms a small minority of the rural population. The survey of the commote of Yssalet has furnished us with a curious illustration of this fact. Several of the common obligations of the peasantry in this district have been commuted for money at the rate of one penny per unit of customary dues. On this basis two lists have been compiled, which inform us that in the eighth year of Edward III's reign (A. D. 1334) there were 126 free landowners in Yssalet, 13 of whom were represented by the 74 free tenants holding from them. The commutation taxes for the progresses of the stalo et garciones fell on the 187 smaller freemen, while the 13 more considerable owners were exempt from it. Altogether there were registered in this way in the commote of Yssalet 200 free landowners and free tenants. As against these, there are 56 villein tenants, or approximately 23 per cent. of the whole number. A similar census was taken in regard to the commutation of dues for the construction of houses and the erection of hedges. The result, though arrived at in a somewhat different way, coincides almost exactly with the above-mentioned calculation. To the 187 rent-paying free tribesmen of the more detailed list correspond 181 in the second case; and to the 56 villein householders correspond 39.[1] It must be remembered, of course, that we deal in this case not with the entire population, but with the numbers of the tenants, and it is by no means impossible that there may have been a certain number of personal servants and labourers on the holdings of the tenants. The census, however, remains a very characteristic indication of the relation between the principal classes of the peasantry.

So much here for the class distinctions of the social scheme. The contrast as regards the grouping of its members is even more marked. Instead of the usual hierarchy of lords, freeholders, and villeins joined in a manorial system, we are met by tribal communities described in great detail. Their composition is dependent on the tie of blood, but they are essentially agnatic, comprising in their enumerations only males and noticing only relationships through males.[2] Both the free and the unfree are grouped in kindreds.[3] These kindreds hold land in communal ownership, and their possessions do not as a rule coincide with the landmarks of the villages (trevs), but spread spider-like through different settlements. For instance, the kindred of Owen Gogh, in the commote of Kaymergh, holds in its exclusive possession only the trev of Thloen (Llwyn), a district the rural area of which covers 138 acres. On the other hand, in four other trevs —Cathus, Maghenbet (Bachymbyd), Gartherewyt (Caserwyd), and Lughhern—it holds only portions of the land, sharing with neighbouring kindreds. The progenies in question is a very large aggregate of co-tenants[4] (coheredes et participes) comprising as many as 25 male persons.[5] It cannot be stated too emphatically that the tenure of the land is

[1] The accuracy of the information is further corroborated by the calculations of the payments in sums of shillings and pence (15*s*. 10*d*. for free tenants and 4*s*. 11*d*. for nativi).

[2] There is one exception on newly-acquired land in our Survey, see f. 284. In the Record of Carnarvon, on the other hand, there are many instances of women holding in co-partnership; see Record of Carnarvon, pp. 268, 271, 249, 248. This is probably attributable to the influence of the English rule as to female co-heirs.

[3] Called progenies or wyrion (lit. grandsons).

[4] The terms 'joint tenants' or 'tenants in common' are purposely avoided, each having acquired a special technical sense in English law.

[5] The exact figure is difficult to ascertain, because it depends on the grouping of the names in the manuscript; but the number can only vary between 23 and 25.

strictly communal; no particular individual is given a preponderant right, but they are all equally priodarii. Noteworthy consequences flow from this principle. To begin with, the members of the kindred of Owen Gogh, just mentioned, are not distributed in the five villages as holders of separate tenements, but appear together as lords of every single one of the five estates, which amount in all to 733 acres. To take the simplest cases, every one of the twenty-five would have his share in the right of ownership in the small trev of Thloen, with its 138 acres. Again, every one of them would claim his share of ownership in a quarter of Maghenbet. These shares are ideal, and not actually marked off on the land: so that the compilers of the Survey, who were trying to turn the soil to account on principles of English cultivation and delimitation, have constantly to make reckonings as to the exact number of acres which would be assigned to these various communities, if the land were actually meted out to them on equitable principles: for instance, in the case of Nanthyn Canon it is said that the portion of each gavell secundum equam participacionem should be 141 acres. Then again the holding in common made it impossible to work the machinery of escheat and forfeiture by ordinary methods. The English conquerors could not seize simply and directly the tenements of the Welsh tribesmen who had taken part in the different risings against English sway. At the same time, they wished to make use of the formidable weapon of confiscation; and they achieved their end by laying hands on as much of the land as would proportionately accrue to the wretched Welshmen who had 'died against the peace'. The Survey gives the most elaborate and exact computations of the amount of land which was thus carved out from the districts held by the tribal communities. To take only one example, we learn from the entries concerning the vills of Maghenbet and Lughhern that the progenies of Radulfus ap Meredith and Ienaf ap Meredith lost the whole of their land 'because all the tenants rebelled against the peace'; at the other end of the scale, the progenies of Gron' ap Morgant lost none of its holding; while in between the two extremes, the progenies of Owen Gogh lost one-eighth of its land. It may be mentioned in this connexion that a difficulty arises when we compare the process of escheat as practised in the surveys with the rules laid down by the codes to regulate succession. If the land in Wales had been all trevgyvriv, then the reckoning of the escheated portion in the manner described above would have presented no difficulty whatever, because the essence of trevgyvriv was the equality of shares between all members of the land-holding community; but, as we know, trevgyvriv was by no means the only mode of holding land, and indeed in the case of free tribesmen succession and tenure seem to have been chiefly adjusted according to rules of treweloghe. Now in this latter case, members of different generations were assigned unequal shares; redistribution was effected only after the complete disappearance of an elder generation, and the offspring of fathers who had died before the elder generation had become extinct could not claim full shares in the course of a repartition. This being so, we are met by the fact that the policy of escheat started from a simpler conception as to the distribution of shares than the law of succession. If the English authorities had proceeded strictly on tribal lines, they ought to have taken account of the degrees produced by dadanhud. As a matter of fact, they did not, and the only explanation which can be suggested for their method of treating confiscation seems to be that they did not want to entangle themselves in the complex mesh of dadanhud computations, and preferred to take a simpler course in taking account of the mere numbers of the rebellious tribesmen. Such a method could be adopted, however, only because the shares of coheredes, though not necessarily equal, were ideal, and therefore the apportionment of the escheat did not override the actual boundaries of fixed holdings.

Lastly, we hear of several cases in which either the English lords of the owners or, in early times, the princes, have moved whole kindreds from one place to another. Thus in the villata of Skeybeon (Ysceibion), in the commote of Kaymergh, the lord holds the entire villata, one-half by way of escheat, and one-half by way of exchange with a certain David ap Griffith, whose progenies, the entry continues, has land allotted to it in the vills of Mathebrut and Trebothle in the commote of Ughdulas. Here the process takes the form of an exchange of land between the lord and the collective body of the kindred.

In this instance we see again that the subjects of rights with whom the lord has to deal are not individuals but groups.

The system of communal estates which we have been considering was characterized by Seebohm as patriarchal. This description, however, is hardly borne out by the facts. The Denbigh Survey, like other Welsh surveys, always insists on the equal rights of the co-tenants, and on the uniformly communal nature of their holdings. Historically, of course, the different kindreds traced their descent from common ancestors ; but these ancestors as a rule had long ceased to exist, and their exuberant progenies were held together by communal comradeship. The Welsh Laws tell us of chieftains of kindreds (pencenedl), but the authority of these chieftains did not supersede communal tenure of land. In the surveys, the chiefs of kindreds are not mentioned as such, and we catch a glimpse of their influence only in indirect ways. It sometimes happens that some particular person is mentioned as representing a kindred in specific transactions ; e. g. in the exchange of territory in Skeybeon, mentioned above, David ap Griffith is referred to as if he were the only person who had to decide on behalf of the progenies. The explanation of this apparent inconsistency seems to lie in the fact that certain persons were considered as the leaders of the different kindred-groups.

We have been examining the use of the term progenies in what may be called its technical sense of a definite kindred. Sometimes it may also appear in the looser sense of family relationship in general. Thus the entry for the villata of Mathebrut in the commote of Ughdulas begins as follows : ' The whole villata of Mathebrut is held in two lecta, viz. the Wele Ithon ap Ithel and the Wele Gron' ap Ithel, and of these two the Wele Ithon ap Ithel is turned into eight progenies, and the Wele Gron' ap Ithel is turned into five progenies.'

With this, however, we need not concern ourselves. As a definite juridical term, the word kindred applies to a union which exercises influence on property and the personal relations of its members to each other. In the description of the commote of Kaymergh, as we have seen, our Survey does no more than trace the distribution of such unions of kindreds. But even there, a case like that of Owen Gogh's progenies suggests a question how the communal right of usage and possession could be apportioned in concreto among the numerous members of a widely spread territorial group. In the surveys of the cantreds of Rewaynok and Roos, we find that the kindred appears as a rule to be differentiated into smaller units—the wele (lecta) and the gavells. There was no strict line of demarcation between these different terms; as we may gather, for instance, from the description of the natural growth of groups in the villata of Wyckwere (Wigfair): Item de secundo Wele quod est extractum de Wele Lauwargh' ap Kendalyk et quod superius nuncupatur Wele Moridyk ap Lauwargh' nulla extrahitur gavella, ideo dicitur id idem Wele nisi vt vna gavella. Vnde Kendalo ap Madok . . . tenent gavellam Moridyk ap Lauwargh' integre. . . .

A further example of this process of growth is the expansion of a single gavell into a number of gavells; thus in regard to the villata of Denbigh, we read that it formerly consisted of two gavells of which one had been differentiated into six. In general the term wele or lectum, meaning literally bed, might be rendered by the expression stock, and we can hardly go far wrong in assuming on the evidence of the Welsh laws that the term was usually applied in Welsh tribal custom to the descendants of a common father, grandfather, or great-grandfather. Up to that point, a close community of interests was maintained not only as against strangers, but also as against more remote relations of the same kindred. A curious corroboration of this rule may be found in our Survey, where it is stated on two or three occasions that inheritance in land went on intestacy down to the third degree (tertium gradum); thus in the commote of Kaymergh it is stated that the son of a freeman on the death of his father must pay the lord ten shillings by way of relief, whereas a brother or nephew or more remote heir to the third degree shall pay twenty shillings for the same relief. Beyond the third degree, relations cannot claim the inheritance, and the land falls to the lord as an escheat; but if the lord wishes to let it, he has to offer it to the nearest in blood (propinquiori de sanguine) for its full price before he offers it to any stranger. The same principle of inheritance to the third degree is stated to exist in the commote of Yssalet. What is meant by the 'third degree' in this case is indicated indirectly by the fact that it comes as a further widening of the circle of near relations beyond the degree of brothers and nephews. The natural inference seems to be that second cousins, as descendants from a common grandfather, would constitute this third degree, or, as we should put it, third generation. When that grade is passed, relationship still exerts a certain influence, but one which is limited at the time of the Survey to a preferential treatment by the lord in the letting of land. Reverting to the notion of common stock, we may assume that it was applied usually to the descendants of a person through males down to the line of great-grandchildren. One would have to go to the Laws to ascertain that such consequences were manifested both in regard to rights of property acquired by inheritance and to common defence, with its concomitant claims of galanas and saraad, &c. As for the surveys, they inform us that the rights and functions of the lecta in regard to property were of the same kind as those of the kindreds (progenies), though more restricted in the sphere of their application. Still, it must not be supposed that progenies and lectum are simply interchangeable terms; at Mathebrut, for example, a clear distinction is implied, for we are told that the vill is held in duobus lectis (or wele) and each wele convertitur in octo or quinque progenies. On the whole, however, a general correspondence appears between the two units of organization in regard to rights of property. Thus we find that the co-parceners of a lectum appear as members of the same society of owners in various villages where the stock has rights of property; for instance Wyckwere, in the commote of Ysdulas, 'consisted, in the days of the princes before the Conquest, of eight lecta, of which six were distributed throughout all the aforesaid places, i. e. Wyckwere, Boydroghyn (Bodrochwyn), and Kilmayl (Kinmel).' Here the lecta are equally distributed; but by the side of such cases, we naturally find others in which the lecta broke up into differentiated settlements in the process of occupying and reclaiming land. A good example is afforded by the Wele Tegwaret at Prees, two tenants of which are identical with two of the three in the Wele Keneuerth at Prees; and similarly the fourth lectum of the progenies Runon ap

Cadugan ap Ostrouth—Wele Gron'—is entirely escheat at Prees, three-fourths of it remains in the hands of three tenants at Caerhebenewith, and one-fourth of it in the hands of three entirely different tenants at Garthkanannel. In such cases, the natural thing would be to speak of the lectum as broken up into gavells.

This leads us to the last of the tribal groups mentioned in the Survey. It may seem at first sight that the gavell was merely a subdivision of the wele, and it was in fact so treated by Seebohm. But it seems that the expression was really used on rather a different plane. If lectum roughly corresponds to the English stock, gavell might be appropriately rendered by the English holding. It cannot be rendered by anything else in a phrase like that which we have already had before us, in the survey of Kaymergh, in regard to the gavell of the kindred Owen Gogh. What is evidently meant is the territorial basis of the kindred's rights, i. e. its holding or estate. The same use is made of the term in several other instances, especially in the commote of Kaymergh; and in Yssalet, in the case of Nanthyn Canon, we are told that Ithel Loyd ap Cadug' et coheredes et participes sui . . tenent dimidiam gavellam integram que fuit Lauwargh' Vaghan. But the term is constantly employed, in the surveys of Yssalet and Ughalet, Ysdulas and Ughdulas, for the specific holdings among which the possessions of a kindred or a wele are distributed. In this case, the gavell may be considered in two aspects—either as the closest and narrowest circle of blood-relations holding in common, or as the territorial basis of their holding. The first or personal aspect may be exemplified by almost any of the cases referred to in the Survey. The number of co-heirs and parceners (coheredes et participes) would sometimes be very considerable, and the tenement might be best described as a 'joint family holding', as in the case of Ithel Loyd ap Cadugan and his coheredes et participes already mentioned. But the territorial aspect is also very prominent. From this point of view we get estimates of the number of acres which ought to have been apportioned to each gavell if the land were held not in ideal shares but in separate occupation; in the case of Pereyon (Prion), for instance, it is said that if the nativi held a share proportionate to their contribution to the tunk, each gavell would take a parcel of 91 acres in arable and wood, and 53 acres in waste; and in Postu (Postyn) the entry records that if all the gavells were equally divided among the three vills which make up the area of Postu, each gavell would have 53 acres. Then again, it is on this basis only that we can find an explanation for a description like that of Abergelleue (Abergele), in which it is stated that the kindred of Edred ap Marghuyd was divided into four stocks (lecta), each of which consisted of $1\frac{1}{2}$ gavells. The expression would be meaningless if applied to personal and not to territorial divisions. It should be noted that the formation of communal unions and holdings on the basis of kinship is by no means restricted to the free population; the nativi (taeogs) are grouped in stocks and gavells in the same way as the free tribesmen, and we actually learn the technical Welsh denominations of these two classes of holding. They are described as 'Rethe' and 'Caythe' gavells. The question of the relative status of the free and the unfree will be considered in greater detail later; but for our present purpose it is significant that the free gavells are in one case at least distinctly reckoned as twice the size of the unfree gavells. The villata of Beryn (Berain), says the Survey, consists of $7\frac{1}{2}$ gavells; one-eighth of the area in question is in the tenure of the freemen pro dimidia gavella, and seven-eighths in the tenure of the nativi in seven gavells. In other respects, the working of these groups seems to have been essentially similar, and the distribution of the native holdings of Pereyon, for example, affords as good an instance of communal conceptions as any of the cases registered under the heading of free tenure; there we have seen that if the shares were equitably divided according to the contribution to the tunk, each gavell of the nativi ought to have 91 acres of arable and wood and 53 acres of waste assigned to it. There is a dispute about the actual use of the common of pasture and estover; the stewards of the lord contend that the claims of the nativi ought to be satisfied by consent of the foresters, while the nativi themselves deny this. This, however, is a point of detail, and does not alter the general conception of the rights of common. But while we must recognize a general similarity in the economy of the free and unfree groups, it may not be purely accidental that in connexion with nativi the term progenies, applied to an extensive kindred or class, is hardly ever used. We constantly hear of weles or gavells held by nativi: but the mention of a progenies of nativi is quite isolated and probably relates not to an organized kindred, but to a loose succession of generations.

When treating of communal organization, one is naturally led to ask in what ways the communal principle asserted itself in the actual occupation and cultivation of land. The full answer to this question must be derived to a great extent from the study of the methods of husbandry employed in Old Wales. But some points may be noticed even at the present stage of our inquiry. In the first place, it is clear that the occupation of the land in common was greatly facilitated by the fact that grazing of cattle and dairy farming were evidently the main pursuits of the Welsh peasantry. In some parts of Denbighshire, with which we are more immediately concerned, no other form of husbandry is possible; even at the present day, this kind of farming seems natural on the precipitous slopes of the hills, and it is rather interesting to discover in our Survey a distinct reference to this feature of the country. In many other instances, however, the experienced eye of an English agriculturalist discovered possibilities of intensive cultivation even in 1334; but the traditional husbandry of the Welsh tribes clung to customary pastoral methods. These considerations suggest themselves again and again when we read in the Survey of wide tracts held by stocks or kindreds, which might have been apportioned in acres, but were as a matter of fact claimed on the principle of equal rural opportunities for the gavells of these tribal groups. In these surroundings, agriculture itself assumed a communal aspect. Seebohm has rightly laid stress on the practices of co-aration so minutely described in the Welsh Laws.[1] They fit in remarkably well with the joint family groups of the gavells. Our Survey throws a side-light on these practices by several interesting references to dues imposed on ploughs. In Meynyot (Meifod) 'every plough at Christmas pays three pence for ploughing, one penny for harrowing'; and in the commote of Yssalet 'every nativus who possesses one plough shall give the lord one crannoc of oats, or eight pence in lieu thereof. . . . He who has less shall give less according to the amount of his contribution to the formation of the plough (quantitatem quam habuerit in carucis). In ordinary years, the number of ploughs is estimated at fourteen.'[1] References in the survey to co-aration and tillage are confined to the case of the taeogs (nativi), because in this instance only do they lead to the payment of dues; but there can be no doubt that the practices implied by the references applied equally in the case of free tribesmen; and it is this latter circumstance which is considered in the Laws.

One more important point remains to be examined. We have been dealing hitherto with those features of the Denbigh Survey which are clearly traceable to the influence of tribal ideas; but our document shows us at the same time how tribal society is gradually modified by the introduction of new principles. It may be broken up by violent methods—a fact to which ample evidence is borne by the confiscations and escheats which followed on the conquest and on the suppression of national risings. Castles and manors spring up before our eyes, and escheated tracts of land are let for rack-rents or farmed to villages by the new lords. But it is even more interesting to observe the gradual changes brought about by social growth and migration. These changes are effected by various processes. In the first place, let us notice the fact that tribal communalism is sometimes transformed into what may be called tenurial communalism. For instance, the use of waste land and waste pasture is as a rule vested not in particular kindreds and stocks, but in the population of entire districts. Then again, it is quite the regular thing for the community of a trev to take over the occupation and management of the escheated portion of its territory. In the description of Prees, we hear of a tract of waste land of no less than 8,878 acres in extent; it is treated as a common for all the tenants of the Honour of Denbigh in Roos, Rewaynok, and Kaymergh; the 'whole community of the villa', we are told, may use the escheated portion of the waste (1,699 acres) for the grazing of their cattle, but nobody except the lord may depasture the beasts of extranei. In Pereyon, we read, ' of the part of the aforesaid gavell which constitutes the escheat, there remains . . . an area of 111 acres . . . from which the lord takes no annual rent-profit; but the whole villata pays six shillings per annum for the pasturage '. Sometimes the communitas villae would farm not merely certain pastoral lands, but the whole estate of an extinct stock. In this way the communitas villae of Moghedreue (Mochdre) holds the Wele Guyon ap Madok and pays tenpence tunk for it; another wele which it holds, that of Bleth' ap Madok, was extirpated, so the entry informs us, in the days of the Earl of Lancaster. These manifestations of the ' village community ' principle are the more remarkable because in the case of the Welsh trevs we have to deal not with ' nucleated ' villages, or large settlements grouped along streets or round a green, but with scattered clusters of homesteads, which nevertheless display a considerable amount of economic solidarity.

The next stage is marked by the rise of a village very similar to the English type, and yet connected historically with tribal antecedents. A case in point is the hamlet of Brenbagle (Brynbagl), which arises on soil laid out by the Earl of Lancaster for grazing purposes, but the occupiers make it into a complete rural settlement divided into eight shares resembling the oxgangs of an English village, and the attungs of Swedish rural settlements.[1] Thus we see that the transition from the tribal to the rural community was a natural and gradual process. Another phase of it comes to our notice in the shape of the frequent substitution of outsiders in the place of the original members and stocks. In many of these cases the admission of outsiders was probably the result of marriages. The old laws refer expressly to inheritance by maternity, which arose either through the admission of husbands to the gavells of their fathers-in-law, or else in consequence of irregular and illicit unions. But in process of time, what may be called transfer of shares was evidently effected in the course of economic transactions—donations, sales, exchanges, &c. It will be sufficient to call attention to one or two characteristic instances. In two cases, the Master of a Hospital of St. John is mentioned among the members of regular gavells. As his place in tribal pedigrees is not traced in any way, he must have acquired his shares by donation or purchase.

The history of the kindred of Rand Vaghan ap Asser presents several interesting features which illustrate our point. Of the four gavells which sprang from the first wele of this kindred, two have been concentrated in the hands of one group of kinsmen, descended from Bleth', the ancestor of the second gavell: so that the progeny of the first gavell named after Guyon ap Ruathlon has altogether disappeared. The third and fourth gavells of the same stock have also suffered great changes. The third, which ought to have contained descendants of Kewret ap Ruathlon, is as a matter of fact headed by a certain Bleth' ap Yeuan ap Madok, who may be connected with the eponymos of the fourth gavell (Madok ap Ruathlon). In this fourth gavell, again, there is only one man, namely the leader (Iorwerth ap David ap Madok), who can possibly be traced to the original occupier, while all the rest of the holders are outsiders —Ken' ap Bleth' ap Grono, Ken' ap Iorwerth ap Tuder, Eden' ap Lauwargh' ap Tuder, and Bleth' his brother (ff. 155–9). The description of Hendrenennyth gives rise to another curious observation. One of the six gavells of the Wele Goither ap Idenerth has entirely lapsed into the hands of the gavell which is headed by Ken' ap Bleth' Vaghan, and consists besides himself of Iorwerth ap Llewelyn ap Bleth', Ken' his brother, Ken' ap Bleth' Loyd, and Hoel his brother (f. 168).

To sum up, we may say that the Welsh surveys, of which our Denbigh record is the best existing example, present invaluable evidence as to the evolution of tenurial and individualistic groups out of tribal communities.

The best way to understand the practical application of these principles is to take a few representative instances of Welsh kindreds in their concrete details. Perhaps the simplest case occurs in the commote of Ughalet (ff. 154–5). There is a progenies of free tenants, called the progenies of Rand Vaghan ap Asser, which used to hold the vills of Grugor, Quilbreyn, Deunant, Pennaualeth, and Penglogor together with one-half of Hendrenennyth and one-third of Prestlegot in four lecta; while the Wele Wyrion Rand, one of thirteen lecta at Petrual, was held by the priodarii of the progenies Rand Vaghan in one lectum. To go back to the four lecta, they were Wele Ruathlon ap Rand, Wele Idenerth ap Rand, Wele Daniel ap Rand, and Wele Kewret ap Rand. The first wele, that of Ruathlon, was divided into four gavells—gavella Guyon ap Ruathlon, gavella Bleth' ap Ruathlon, gavella Kewret ap Ruathlon, and gavella Madok ap Ruathlon. The first two of these gavells were held by Ken' ap Bleth' Vaghan, Ior' ap Lewelyn ap Bleth', Ken' ap Lewelyn ap Bleth, Ken' ap Bleth' Loyd, and Howel ap Bleth' Loyd. Thus :

Taking this as normal we find the progenies of the original founder divided into the four wele or lecta of his sons, these again into the gavells of his grandsons, which were held by his great-grandsons or even great-great-grandsons, with perhaps some outsiders.[1]

Another example, raising some additional problems, is furnished by the progenies of Runon ap Cadugan ap Ostrouth, which held one-sixth of Prees (ff. 92–3) in five lecta, viz. Wele Tegwaret, Wele Ior', Wele Gron', Wele Yarthur, Wele Keneuerth.[2] The Wele Tegwaret at Prees was held by Howel ap Madok and Ior' Loyt his brother, who paid 4*d.* tunk, but rendered all other services in Garthkanannel. Turning to Garthkanannel (f. 253) we find Hoel ap Madok ap Ior', Ior' his brother, David ap Ririd Vaghan, Rir' ap David ap Ririth, Eynon ap Ior' ap Eynon, and Ior' ap Griff' ap Ior' holding three-fourths of the [1] Seebohm, Tribal System of Wales, p. 43, wrongly calls the progenies of Rand Vaghan ap Asser a wele. Cf. Vinogradoff, Growth of the Manor, p. 89, n. 5.

[2] See Table I below.

Wele Tegwaret ap Runon. At Caerhebenewith (f. 183) Madok ap Heilyn, Yeuan ap Atha ap Eythef, and Hoel ap Tuder ap Edden' hold the whole wele of Tegwaret ap Runon, paying 6*d.* tunk, but the rest of the payments in Ughdulas commote, i. e. obviously in Garthkanannel. There are two difficulties in regard to this wele: why does the wele remain intact at Prees and Caerhebenewith, while one-fourth of it had escheated at Garthkanannel? and secondly, why are there two members of the wele only at Prees, the same two at Garthkanannel with four others, and three entirely different persons at Caerhebenewith? Passing now to the fifth wele of the progenies of Runon ap Cadugan ap Ostrouth, that of Keneuerth, we get Howel ap Madok Gogh, Ior' his brother, and Ieuan ap Ath' ap Eythef holding three-fourths of it at Prees and paying all but tunk at Garthkanannel. Turning to Garthkanannel we find Hoel ap Madok ap Ior', Ior' his brother, Ririth ap David ap Ririth, Ior' his brother, Eynon ap Ior' ap Eynon, Ior' ap Griff' ap Ior', Yeuan ap Atha ap Eythef, Hoel ap Tuder ap Eden', Yeuan ap Bleth' ap David ap Ior' ap Bleth' and ten more holding three-fourths of the wele; while at Caerhebenewith Howel ap Madok Gogh, Yeuan ap Atha ap Eythef, Yeuan ap Bleth' ap David, and Howel ap Tuder ap Edden hold the whole wele. Why is it that in this case too the whole wele remains intact at Caerhebenewith, while one-fourth of it is escheat both in Prees and Garthkanannel? And why do only three tenants appear at Prees, four at Caerhebenewith, two having been already mentioned at Prees and the other two to be mentioned at Garthkanannel, where there are nineteen tenants, fourteen of whom do not appear at Prees or Caerhebenewith? And why is it that the two tenants of the Wele Tegwaret at Prees are identical with two of the three in the Wele Keneuerth at Prees? Why are the three tenants of the Wele Tegwaret at Caerhebenewith identical with three of the four of the Wele Keneuerth, while one of them, Madok ap Heilyn, is also the sole tenant of the Wele Yarthur at Caerhebenewith? And why are five of the six tenants of the Wele Tegwaret at Garthkanannel identical with five of the nineteen tenants of the Wele Keneuerth? Similarly the third lectum of the progenies Runon ap Cadugan ap Ostrouth, Wele Gron', is entirely escheat at Prees, three-fourths of it remains in the hands of three tenants at Caerhebenewith and one-fourth of it in the hands of three entirely different tenants at Garthkanannel.

Let us now pass to what is perhaps the most perfect example of the complicated ramifications of a progenies, that of Edred ap Marghuyd.[1] His progenies held one-fourth of Abergele (f. 225) in four lecta, each of one and a half gavells, viz. Wele Ithel ap Edred, which was held as to one-third of one gavell by sixteen tenants; Wele Rees ap Edred, of which one-half and one-fifth and one-tenth and one-sixth still remained in the hands of twenty-two tenants who paid also in Heskyn and Postu; Wele Bleth' ap Edred, of which one-third remained in the hands of sixteen tenants who paid also in Kylkeyn; and lastly Wele Idenerth. Of this last wele there were five lecta at Abergele: (i) Wele Lauwargh' ap Goug', of which one-sixty-fourth and one-eighty-fourth in Abergele and one-sixteenth, one-sixty-fourth and one-eighty-fourth in the hamlets of Bodelennan and Massegwyk were escheat, the rest being held by twenty-nine tenants; (ii) Wele Gron' ap Goug', five-sixths of which was held by seventeen tenants; (iii) Wele Risshard ap Goug', eleven-twelfths of which was held by fourteen tenants; (iv) Wele Madok ap Goug', eleven-twelfths of which was held by eighteen tenants; and (v) Wele Ior' ap Goug', of which one-half less one-thirtieth remained.

Further, the Wele Edred ap Marghuyd was one of four lecta at Loydcoyd (f. 272), and was divided into the same four lecta, viz. Wele Rees ap Edred, Wele Bleth' ap Edred, Wele Ithel ap Edred, and Wele Idenerth ap Edred. Taking them in the same order as before, the Wele Ithel is divided into two progenies, Ithon and Gron', each of which had held half the wele; at present nineteen tenants held two-thirds of the share of the progenies Ithon and seventeen tenants held fourteen-fifteenths of the share of the progenies Gron'; nine of these thirty-six tenants, it may be noticed, are identical with nine of the sixteen who held the Wele Ithel at Abergele. The whole of the Wele Rees ap Edred at Loydcoyd was held by fifteen tenants, five of whom had already appeared as tenants of the Wele Rees at Abergele. The Wele Bleth' ap Edred at Loydcoyd was held as to one-half and one-eighth and one-fiftieth by eleven tenants, ten of whom had already appeared at Abergele. The Wele Idenerth at Loydcoyd was again divided as before into five lecta: (i) seventeen tenants, thirteen of whom had appeared in Abergele, held three-fourths of the Wele Lauwargh' ap Goug'; (ii) seven tenants, six of whom had been named at Abergele, held the whole Wele Gron' ap Goug'; (iii) six tenants, identical with those at Abergele, held three-fourths of the Wele Risshard ap Goug'; (iv) ten tenants, of whom eight certainly and possibly the remaining two had appeared at Abergele, held five-sixths of the Wele Madok ap Goug'; while (v) the progenies of Ior' ap Goug' held the whole of his wele at Loydcoyd.

Further, the vill of Mathebrut (f. 250) was held in two lecta of the descendants of Ithel ap Edred ap Marghuyd, viz. Wele Ithon ap Ithel and Wele Gron' ap Ithel, each of which is 'converted' into progenies. The Wele Ithon was 'converted' into eight progenies, of which the first, progenies Gron' ap Ithon, comprising six tenants, none of whom had appeared at Abergele of Loydcoyd, held one-eighth of the wele less one-fifteenth, which was escheat; the second, progenies Eden' ap Ithon, comprising three tenants, who were named at Loydcoyd as members of the progenies Ithon, held one-eighth of the wele; the third, progenies Ior' ap Ithon, comprising five tenants, one of whom had appeared at Loydcoyd as a member of the progenies Ithon, held half of the eighth of the wele; the fourth, progenies Griffud ap Ithon, comprising the same tenants as held in the progenies Ior' ap Ithon, held half of the eighth of the wele; the fifth, progenies Madok ap Ithon, comprising four tenants, who had all appeared at Loydcoyd as members of the progenies Ithon and three of whom had been named as tenants of the Wele Ithel at Abergele, held one-eighth of the wele; the sixth, progenies Ken' ap Ithon, comprising twelve tenants, seven of whom had appeared at Loydcoyd, held one-eighth of the wele; the seventh, progenies Griffri ap Ithon, comprising five tenants, of whom four had appeared at Loydcoyd, held one-eighth of the wele; the eighth part of the wele, which had belonged to Mad' Duy ap Ken ap Lauwargh' ap Eynon ap Ithon, had escheated because he had died without heirs. Similarly, the Wele Gron' ap Ithel was 'converted' into five progenies. The first, progenies Hoidilo, represented by Yeuan ap Madok ap Eynon, who appeared as a member of the progenies Gron' at Loydcoyd and as a tenant of the Wele Ithel at Abergele, held one-fifth of the Wele Gron' at Mathebrut; the second, progenies Ior', comprising five tenants, three of whom had appeared at Loydcoyd, held one-fifth of the Wele Gron'; the third, progenies Oweyn, represented by Ior' ap Kuhelyn ap Ken', held the third fifth of this wele; the fourth progenies, that of Ririd, comprising nine tenants, seven of whom had appeared as members of the progenies Gron' ap Ithel at Loydcoyd and six as tenants of the Wele Ithel at Abergele, held one-fifth of the Wele Gron' less one-twelfth; the fifth progenies, that of Cadugan, was represented by three tenants, who had appeared in Loydcoyd as members of the progenies Gron' and held here one-sixth of the last fifth of the Wele Gron'.

Further, the progenies of Willym ap Rees ap Edred ap Marghuyd held Heskyn in five gavells and Postu in four gavells (ff. 190, 192); one-third of the first gavell, that of Doyok, was in the hands of seven tenants in both Heskyn and Postu, and five of them had appeared in Abergele as tenants of the Wele Rees; the second gavell, that of Hoydylo, both in Heskyn and Postu was held by Griff' ap Ken' ap Ior', who also appeared in Abergele as a tenant of the Wele Rees; the third gavell, that of Lowargh', was held to the extent of five-sixths both in Heskyn and Postu by four tenants; the fourth gavell, that of Ken', was escheat both in Heskyn and Postu; the fifth gavell, that of Cuhelyn, was held as to four-fifths in Heskyn and also in Beydiok (f. 190) by nine tenants, six of whom had appeared in Abergele as tenants of the Wele Rees ap Edred.

Further, the progenies Bleth' ap Edred ap Marghuyd held Kylkeyn (f. 239) in three lecta; five-sixths of the first wele, that of Gwyon ap Bleth', was held by fifteen tenants, not one of whom had appeared in Loydcoyd or Abergele; two-thirds less one-seventieth of the second wele, that of Guyn ap Bleth', was held by twelve tenants, eleven of whom had appeared as tenants of the Wele Bleth' in Loydcoyd and all of them as tenants of the Wele Bleth' at Abergele; the third wele, that of Lawargh' ap Bleth', was held as to three-eighths by four tenants, three of whom were tenants of the Wele Bleth' at Abergele.

Further, the progenies Goug' ap Idenerth ap Edred held Toronoth (f. 240) in five lecta: the first wele, that of Lauwargh' ap Goug', was held with the exception of one-twentieth by the progenies of Lauwargh' ap Goug', which also held fifteen-sixteenths of his wele at Laethenayn (f. 267); two-thirds of the second wele, that of Gron' ap Goug', was held by the progenies of Gron' ap Goug', which also held three-fourths of his wele at Laethenayn; seven-eighths of the third wele, that of Risshard ap Goug', was held by the progenies of Risshard, which also held seven-eighths of his wele at Laethenayn; eight-ninths of the fourth wele, that of Madok ap Goug', was held by the progenies of Madok, which also held eight-ninths of his wele at Laethenayn; the fifth wele, that of Ior' ap Goug', was held as to one-half less one-thirtieth by the progenies called Wyrion Eden'; the whole of this wele at Laethenayn, less the share of Gron' ap Heilyn Seys which was escheat, was also held by the Wyrion Eden', here called the progenies Ken' ap Ior' (f. 267), a progenies which also held one lectum of the two at Brenfanyk (f. 238), comprising three-fourths of the Wele Ken' ap Ior'; here the progenies was represented by five tenants who held half the wele, four of these tenants also appear in Tuennan (f. 268), where the progenies Ken' ap Ior' represented by fourteen members held two-thirds of the vill, one-third which had belonged to Gron' ap Heilyn ap Ken' being escheat. Further, at Dynorbyn Vaghan (f. 212) the Wyrion Eden', in this case called the progenies of David ap Eynon ap Ken' ap Ior', held one-half and one-eleventh of the Wele Griffri ap Trahairn.

Thus we find portions of this great family of Edred ap Marghuyd holding the three vills of Heskyn, Postu, and Beydiok in the commote of Ughalet, the two vills of Kylkeyn and Toronoth, half the vills of Brenfanyk and Dynorbyn Vaghan and one-quarter of the vill of Abergele in the commote of Ysdulas, and the three vills of Mathebrut, Tuennan, and Laethenayn and one-quarter of Loydcoyd in the commote of Ughdulas.

WOOD, WASTE, AND PASTURE

In the Denbigh Extent society and agriculture are seen in a state of transition, with a modified form of the English manorial system superimposed on the old kindred-groups, and with feudal rules and ideas gradually changing, though not entirely superseding, the old Welsh customs. Settlements were now fixed and reckoned in acres, and the new lords were anxious to turn their property to better account. Thus we find that far more of the land was being brought under cultivation, woods were being cleared and marshes drained, bits of the waste were beginning to be let out at money rents, and the common rights of the tenants were often curtailed, or only allowed to be retained in return for money payments.

Whether, however, the land had escheated to the lord, or had been let out by him in small portions to new tenants, or was still in the possession of a kindred-group, there is no reason to think that it had lost its pastoral character or that the predominance of pastoral over agricultural pursuits had ceased.

The Extent shows the amount of wood and waste existing in every part of the country—sometimes forest land, sometimes wild moorland, sometimes land that would have been well worth cultivating had it been needed; but there was no pressure of population and, despite the increase of agriculture, there was abundance of pasture for the flocks and herds of the villagers, and plenty of good land was still left untilled. Only once does an instance occur of restricting cultivation in order to save sufficient pasture for the community; this is in the vill of Lanassok, where the portion which escheated to the lord contained land from which he obtained no profit, because it had to be used for the benefit of the tenants, who without it would have been short of pasture.[1]

Almost invariably each villata is said to contain 'land, wood and waste', but the proportion of each cannot be calculated accurately. We get a rough idea of this proportion, however, in the case of the escheated land, since it is possible to compare the number of acres let out to different tenants at money rents with the part left over, which latter was always kept as grazing ground. Apparently the rented portions of the escheat were mainly arable, and the unoccupied part was needed for pasturing the beasts of these new cultivators. As the lord's escheat was merely a fractional portion of the wele, in all probability the non-escheated portions would be very similar in character. It is very usual to find that the pastoral land of the lord's excheat was considerably larger than the rented portion. This might be due in part to the scarcity of population and to the fact that no more arable land was wanted at the moment, but it points also to the constant demand for pasture-land and shows that the tenants possessed beasts which had to be fed, and a greater number of them than would be necessary for the plough teams. In some cases the nature of the soil, although good enough for grazing purposes, rendered it unsuitable for tillage.

There are numerous examples of this excess of pasture over arable in the escheat. In the villata of Deunant,[1] of the lord's 153 acres, over 96 were unlet and used as pasture-land. At Quilbreyn,[2] out of 353 acres the lord had only rented about 42. In Barrok,[3] 341 acres were used as pasture from a total of 561; in Petrual,[4] 248 out of 312. In Guythheryn,[5] where the lord's escheat amounted to 1,204 acres, nearly 1,100 were unlet and used as common pasture; and many more examples might be given. Instances can be found where the rented portion exceeded the pastoral in area, but they are not numerous,[6] while only in one or two cases, as at Caerhebenewith and Calledan, had the lord let out the whole of his escheat.[7]

In many of these instances the land was quite fit for cultivation had it been needed, and where that was the case the compiler of the Survey entered the amount of gain which would accrue to the lord if this were done.[8] On the other hand, there are also places where special mention is made of woods or moors on the estate—land which would have needed a great deal of reclaiming before it could have been put to other than pastoral uses. The commote of Kaymergh seems to have contained the largest proportion of this kind of land. Various large woods are mentioned by name, and some districts, such as Kernyneuet and Bishoppeswall, were only just being reclaimed, and were still mainly composed of waste pasture-ground. In the commote of Yssalet there was a good deal of better pasture and rather fewer woods; and in the rest of the country, with the exception of the Forest of Arquedelok, the existence of pasture-land is chiefly implied by the numerous butter dues owed by the inhabitants. Everywhere there is abundant evidence of the wild nature of the country, of the comparatively small amount of acreage already brought under cultivation, and of the prevalence throughout of pasture-land and grazing farms.

The exact nature of the woods and wastes is only occasionally given in the Extent; oak woods are specially mentioned, and round the castle of Denbigh thick thorn woods and alder plantations;[1] moorland-pasture (landee) occurs also in the same neighbourhood, and the waste of Havodelwe appears to have been used as grazing ground, since 180 animals could be kept on its 650 acres.[2] Marsh-land is also found here and there, but it was less valuable than the sicca pastura.[3] Every sort of land seems to have been used for pasture, some permanently, some occasionally, besides the real wastes and commons.

In the Extent the different capacity of land is often indicated by a calculation of its rent or value per acre, either actual or potential. In the manor of Astret Oweyn the old friscum was only fit for pastoral uses, and was valued at the same rate as what was called 'weak pasture', viz. at 6*d.* an acre.[4] Ordinary pasture-land on this estate was worth 8*d.* an acre, and so was the pastura profunda of the marsh-land in Kilforn.[5] Dry pasture was the more valuable, being worth as much as 1*s.* an acre.[6] In the manor of Denbigh, one small enclosed piece of pasture was valued at 1*s.* 4*d.* an acre.[7] In the manor of Dynorbyn, there were several separate portions in the demesne varying from 1*s.* to 1*s.* 3*d.* an acre:[8] in fact, all pasture mentioned as enclosed appears to have been worth on an average as much as 1*s.* 2*d.* an acre. As compared with the other kinds of land, actual waste, for which herbage—sometimes only a very nominal sum—was paid, naturally appears of little value.[1] The better pasture-land, on the other hand, does not fall much below the value of arable. On the manor of Astret Oweyn, where the value per acre is given throughout, pasture-land varies from 6*d.* to 8*d.* an acre and arable land from 8*d.* to 10*d.* In Kilforn, land under tillage is reckoned at 1*s.* an acre, exactly the same price as the best pasture-land. Meadow-land is almost invariably of higher value; frequently 1*s.* 6*d.* an acre, and in one instance as much as 3*s.*[2]

[1] ff. 46–7. [2] f. 150. [3] ff. 5, 214. [4] f. 2.
[5] f. 5. [6] f. 4. [7] f. 48. [8] f. 214.

On the manor of Kilforn we get some good examples of the way in which land was used indifferently for corn, for hay, or for grazing. There are various instances of weak friscum, said to be only possible for pasture. In a field actually known as Calfpasture, some old arable land existed, and a place called Kermede (i.e. low, flat pasture) had been converted into meadow-land. On the other hand, about nineteen acres of soil which had formerly been arable were now pasture boum. Horskerre and Koukerre, judging from their names, must have been used for pasture at some time or another; whilst Wetekerre sounds a contradiction in terms. Evidently there was little systematic cultivation and land was often converted from one use to another.

The Extent gives no direct information as to the beasts kept, their nature or their value. Probably the pastus for the Prince and his officials and servants must have comprised milk, cheese, and meat, but these food dues are not enumerated and had largely been commuted for money. The lord himself did not require many beasts, since the home-farm system was so little in vogue. His food was provided for him, and labour services with his own animals or those of his tenants were not often required. Among the customs of the nativi at Meynyot, in the commote of Ysdulas, a few ploughing services are entered and the man with only one ox receives special mention.[3] In that commote, too, butter dues were very frequent, especially from the nativi; so that they must have kept cows for milking as well as for tillage. Undoubtedly sheep were kept as well as cattle. In the manor of Astret Oweyn we find bovaria and bercaria on the demesne, and in the manor of Dynorbyn Vaur pasture for sheep was ordered on some old arable which was too much exhausted for anything else.[1] The pasture of the waste of Havodelwe above mentioned, on which 180 animals could be kept, was worth 40*s.*; this works out at about 3*d.* a head, and implies that they were large beasts, such as cows and oxen.[2] In the same neighbourhood, there is a curious entry indicating that the lord had a horse-breeding establishment there; if the lord should choose to enclose a waste called Galgheved, it was estimated that it might hold as many as sixty mares with their foals.[3] Pigs were probably kept as well as cattle and sheep; there were plenty of woods where they could be fed, and special mention is made from time to time of oak woods. In Postu the thick oak-trees of the wood of Coidrawhan are said to render cultivation impossible, and they must have provided good mast for the pasture of swine.[4] Pannage also is once mentioned by name, when the value of forests in the commote of Ughdulas is reckoned including pannage and honey.[5] The smaller animals, however, seem to have been less numerous and less important than the cattle, or else they are systematically neglected in the Survey. In the villata of Arquedelok, in two farms let out at stock and land lease, one bull and twenty-four cows were leased with thirty-one acres of land, and there is no mention of sheep and goats.[6]

Judging from this evidence, cattle-farming appears to have been the most usual occupation throughout the whole district, and corn was grown according to the immediate needs of the inhabitants. The rare mention of sheep is curious in a country like Wales; possibly there were flocks on the hills of which nothing was noted in the Survey; but the Welsh had probably been too remote to take part in the wool-trade, and sheep were not yet of much value in consequence.

[2] Cf. the value of pasture per head of beasts in the Black Book of St. Davids, where as a rule 1*d.* or 2*d.* was paid for large animals, and for pigs and sheep in groups of ten, e.g. p. 109, ibid.

The references in the Extent to pastoral conditions and common rights show the survival of old privileges despite the development of seignorial power. Probably in the period before the conquest, as the evidence of the Welsh Laws helps to prove, all waste land was held in common, and the beasts of the freeman and the nativus grazed side by side with the herds of the chief. In the kindred-groups each gavell might have its own plot, or the whole vill would share in the waste land. After the conquest the growth of territorial lordships introduced a conflicting element into primitive conditions, but the new masters were still hampered by old arrangements and obliged to respect the claims of their tenants.

The Extent, therefore, illustrates different stages in the lord's encroachments on old rights of pasture. There were still some lands—generally on the slopes of the hills or by the roadsides—which were strictly common, and for which no dues at all were paid. Then there were woods and wastes still called common, but for the use of which the lord demanded herbage, generally a very small sum paid by the whole vill in a body. Thirdly, there were pasture-lands for which a very heavy herbage was demanded; and fourthly, we find that the lord had frequently enclosed certain woods and pastures for his own use. He could not, however, do away completely with the rights of his tenants on such lands, and he had to allow them pasture or, at least, housebote, heybote, and estoveria. Also the lord could not enclose too much land: he was bound to secure a proper provision of pasture for all the inhabitants on his estates. A few examples may be given to illustrate these different stages.

There was first the absolutely free and common pasture. This is found in Denbigh itself, where the whole vill claimed common in ways and wastes comprising 41 acres, and there is no mention of any payment being made in return.[1] In Lewenny and Astret Canon as much as 936 acres of similar land were held quite freely, but it is specially entered as 'by grant of the Earl of Lincoln';[2] probably he had confirmed an old right when he took over the lordship.

The second stage, where small pasture dues were owed by the whole vill, was perhaps the most usual. These dues appear little more than nominal; 5*s.*, 6*s.* 8*d.*, 10*s.*, 13*s.* 4*d.* occur most frequently, as if there were a tendency to have a fixed rate without regard to area. In Beryn all the tenants of the vill claimed common pasture for animals of all kinds and paid for herbage to the lord, 6*s.* 8*d.*[1] In Talabryn the rate was the same, and the waste was reckoned at 88 acres; here, as at Lewenny, the Earl of Lincoln is said to have granted this pasture.[2] In both these places large pieces of land were 'left over' from the lord's escheat, because they lay in the common waste and no one would take them up to cultivate for that reason. In Kernyneuet the waste was common to all the tenants in return for 15*s.*, a sum which gave them pasture rights in the surrounding woods also, even in some which are entered as private property.[3]

The third stage is marked by the payment of herbage at a much higher rate and not in such round sums. This implies that the lord considered the land more strictly as his own, and that the payment was no longer merely a due for the retention of old common rights. This is particularly clear where the lord is said to 'sell the pasture', a phrase which is sometimes substituted for the usual entry of herbage.[4] In Eryvyot various assarts were made out of a wood, which was nevertheless called 'common', and for the residue the vill paid for herbage as much as 50*s.*[5] In the commotes of Ysdulas and Ughdulas these high herbages occur with especial frequency, and the amounts seem very irregular, 17*s.* 1*d.*, 37*s.* 4*d.*, 53*s.*, 55*s.*, to mention a few sums only, being paid by various vills in the former district,[6] while in the commote of Ughdulas we find payments from the whole commote for forest-land, from which the inhabitants might take pannage, honey, and wood for fences, in return for the sum of 67*s.* 8*d.*[7] From vills here a payment of 40*s.*

[3] ff. 19–20. In Postu the inhabitants paid 5*s.*, and for that were allowed to use the lord's own woods, as well as the common pasture, ff. 22–3.

[4] In Bysshopeswall 'pastura venditur communibus annis pro xx*s.*', f. 20. In Havodelwe 'pastura venditur . . . pro xx*s.*', f. 150.

[5] f. 112. Other examples are: f. 139, Penporghethl, herbage 25*s.* 'for the residue of the lord's part of the wood and waste'; f. 183, Petrual, herbage 26*s.* 8*d.* These seem to be multiples of 5*s.* or 6*s.* 8*d.*, but some payments are much less regular.

[6] Cf. ff. 208, 220, 237, 241, 242. [7] f. 281.

for herbage was quite common,[1] and Erethlyn paid as much as 78*s.* 5*d.*[2] Such sums seem different in character from the low herbages noted earlier, and are more like rents paid to the lord for pasture-land by communities instead of by individuals or single households. Where very small sums were due the tenants were doubtless safeguarding rights over lands which had always been common in the past.

Fourthly, there was the private pasture-land held by the lord, which seems to have come to him either as part of his escheat or in consequence of definite forfeiture of special wood or waste. The waste of Pennanthlugeyn, for example, had come into possession of the Earl of Lincoln as the result of an insurrection, and the pasture on it was sold at the rate of 2*d.* an acre. This waste had been forfeited by one individual, the Prince David ap Iorwerth, and there are no traces of common rights upon it at all.[3] In most cases, however, the lord had very limited profits from his private pasture-land, owing to the survival of old free use. In Kernyneuet two woods, Le Bedowe and Escaerwen, were sold to the lord as an individual possession, but he could take nothing from them legally on account of his tenants' claims; no separate herbage was paid to him for these rights, since a common payment of 15*s.* was considered to cover privileges of pasture throughout the whole estate.[4] This looks like an instance of the appropriation of common lands by the lord, although the Survey does state that in Le Bedowe at least the demands of the tenants were really unjust.[5] In Kylkenneys, again, the lord had a separate wood, in which the priodarii still had rights of pasture and estoveria, for which apparently they paid nothing to him;[6] obviously a survival of their former privileges.

It was also possible for individual tenants to hold private woods and pasture from the lord if they chose to pay him for it, and they were equally obliged to respect any old rights which might survive in such holdings. That ordinary tenants, irrespective of status, could have these private woods, is implied by the entry which says that free men and nativi in the commote of Yssalet might take any honey which they found in their own woods, as well as housebote, heybote, and estoveria; if they had no private woods these latter necessities might be taken from the common woods, but honey found there was to be given to the lord.[1] In the commote of Kaymergh even the priodarii who had private woods could only take for themselves housebote, heybote, and estoveria; they might not make clearances nor root up the trees.[2] These private woods and wastes, which were generally portions of the lord's escheat let out to be held in herbage,[3] were however rare, since the common pasture sufficed as a rule for ordinary needs, and rights were maintained as far as possible on all lands over which they had been exercised in the past.

[1] At Tebrith, Mathebrut, and Trebothle 40*s.* was paid for 350, 128, and 118 acres respectively, ff. 248, 253, 266.

[2] f. 263. [3] f. 199. [4] f. 20. [5] Ibid. [6] ff. 249–50.

The Extent gives no definite information as to any legal basis for these claims of common pasture rights, nor does it imply that there was a limit of any kind to the number of beasts which the tenants might send out to graze. The pasture is not really appendant, as might appear from the Statute of Rhuddlan; for rights over it date back to the time when kinship and fractional shares were the custom in the vills, not the division of actual acre strips amongst the members of the community. There is one curious instance of a man's share in the common waste being calculated out into actual acres, as well as his arable portion. The land in this case at the time of the Survey had escheated to the lord, but the old possessor, Eignon ap Bleth', was said to have had arable amounting to 1 acre 3 roods 8 perches; and his portion of the common waste, if divided, would have amounted to 15 acres 1 rood 9 perches.[4] Evidently there was common pasture for the whole kin-group, and this estimate was the result of calculating in acres the fractional share belonging to this man in both kinds of land.

In one case, at least, we seem to see the lord setting limits to the pastoral privileges of the tenants; this is at Pereyon, where the nativi whom he had left in possession were only

[1] ff. 148–9. [2] f. 44.

[3] At Brenbagle the whole vill had escheated to the lord and he let it out to be held 'in herbagio'; the tenants illegally converted some of this pasture-land into arable and built a hamlet upon it, f. 17; cf. above, p. xxviii.

allowed to feed their own animals in the common wood and waste, never to let out any share in it to strangers; and even their estoveria they were to take 'at times of common pasture', not all the year round.[1] This was evidently a reduction of old rights, for the tenants did not acquiesce in the settlement which the lord's court had decreed on the matter, and it was still a disputed question.

It is to be noted in regard to the woods that rights and customs as to the chase have left no trace whatever in the Survey.

AGRICULTURE

Speaking of twelfth-century Wales, Giraldus Cambrensis makes the general statement that 'most land is used for pasture but little for agriculture', and this must be held to be more true of Denbighshire at the time of the Extent than of Carnarvonshire at the time of its survey, or of the land to the east at the date marked by the extant Court Rolls of Ruthin. This conclusion rests partly on the evidence of agricultural services, partly on that of the different crops that were raised.

Now in the Denbigh Extent there only appear to be four manorial centres, viz. Astret Oweyn, Kilforn, Denbigh, and Dynorbyn Vaur. Besides these, there are indications of embryo manors in the case of vills grouped round one of their number where the services are due. In the commote of Ughalet the lord has no manors, and here the progenies of Rand Vaghan ap Asser and Rees Gogh' hold a very strong position. Moreover, judging from these facts and from the large areas belonging to each vill described as waste and rented for pasturage by the communitas villae, the inhabitants of this commote must have been in great part engaged in pastoral pursuits. The character of the country clinches the matter. The following passage from Leland's Itinerary is conclusive: 'In Hughe Aleth be many bogges, rokky hilles and morisch ground; and the soil is to cold to have good corne, yet in diverse places it berith otes and sum rye.

[1] f. 16. According to one entry in the Record of Carnarvon, p. 107, the time for common pasture was from All Saints' Day to the Feast of St. Philip and St. James; but this may have been merely a case of arable land thrown open after harvest.

It hath in sum places woode. This commote is the worst parte of al Denbigh land and most barren.' [1]

The manor had a disturbing effect upon tribal tenures in the Honour of Denbigh as elsewhere. This is well illustrated by the account given in the Record of Carnarvon of the manor of Treffog, which is surrounded by some fourteen vills. The inhabitants of these vills hold almost exclusively in groups, of which about two-thirds hold in villeinage, the remaining one-third freely. The agricultural services of the former are fairly heavy. A certain Sace ap Ithel along with seven others has to work for the lord one day of every week in the year. Again, in Treffos the holders in villeinage of twenty-eight messuages and twenty-six bovates of land have to send nine men to work for the lord one day in every week.[2]

In this connexion, the conclusion in regard to the Denbigh evidence is that, arguing from the apparent virility of the tribal groups, the paucity of manors, the comparative rarity of agricultural services, especially where weles and gavells held a strong position as in Ughalet, the people of the five commotes must, in contra-distinction to their fellow countrymen in many other districts, have been engaged in pastoral pursuits to a far greater degree than in agriculture.

The difference in this respect between the Honour of Denbigh and other parts of Wales depends also on the evidence that can be gathered as to the crops that were raised. The Black Book of St. Davids continually mentions oats, wheat, barley, and more seldom peas and beans. The number of bushels to be sown to the acre is carefully stated in each case. From a study of these entries it is evident that by far the favourite crop was oats. In the Carnarvon Record we find groups of joint-holders, both free and bond, repeatedly paying among their rents in kind measures of oats, wheat, barley, meal, and malt. In the Court Rolls of Ruthin occurs a case in which John the Forester complains of Willin ap Mereduth, 'for that he took and carried away feloniously and thievishly and against the peace, one grange full of wheat and rye, beans and

[1] In the greater part of the Black Book of St. Davids, on the other hand, it is evident that the population is very actively engaged in agriculture.

peas, and another grange of eight fathoms full of oats.'[1] This kind of entry occurs over and over again. Compared with these several enumerations the Denbigh Extent has little to present. The raising of oats is common to all the five commotes; references to crannoc' avene and cribar' avene are frequent enough. On the other hand, renders of wheat, crannoc' frumenti, disci farine, occur only in the lowlands between the river Elwy and the Sea, in the commotes of Ysdulas and Ughdulas. Probably, also, in two or three out of the four manors mentioned in the Extent, where the arable or part of it was cultivated in three seasons, one or other of these crops would be raised. Spring-wheat and winter-wheat are mentioned in the Codes, and Giraldus mentions wheat and barley, but these crops would only be raised in the most fertile spots, and probably Giraldus was thinking chiefly of Anglesey. The arable throughout the greater part of the whole region covered by the Denbigh Extent was either cropped in oats year after year, or alternated between oats and fallow yearly or in groups of years. Giraldus Cambrensis says, 'Practically the whole population feeds on flesh, oats, milk, cheese, and butter. They eat flesh regularly and bread seldom.' In Owen's Pembrokeshire several confirmatory passages occur. Under the heading 'Winter Corne (Wheate and Rie), whie not sowen in the Welsh Contrey', we have the following[2]: 'The perte of the sheere inhabited by the Welshmen as before is saied, followinge their forefathers' husbandrie, regard more the tillinge of oats than of the former graines. . . . The causes whie these mountainlie partes doe use this tillinge of oates whereas their land is good and apt enoughe to beare wheate and rie are diverse. The one and not the least is the use thereof of ancient tyme and being brought up therein are hardlie drawen to alter their custome. . . . Oates are sowen for 7 or 8 years, then they let the lande lie in pasture for 8 or 10 years. . . . Yet cannot these dotinge husbands be drawen to forego their fathers' follie.'

Such analogies lead to the probable conclusion that we have before us in the Denbigh Extent very different systems of agriculture. There are the two manors where the arable is definitely said to be laid out in three seasons. There is Astret Oweyn where there might be three seasons but are not. There is the manor at Denbigh where there may have been three seasons though we are not told so. Lastly, there is the more or less primitive agriculture of the Welsh tribesmen. The manorial agriculture will first be examined, and then the tribal. Several important survivals of the latter will be found in the former.

The manor of Kilforn was made for himself by Henry de Lacy out of parts of the vills of Kilforn and Astret Canon.[1] It has been artificially and arbitrarily imposed on the old tribal economy by means of escheat and exchange. The older system of agriculture is traceable in the name of one of the fields of the manor, le Whitefeld.[2] This points back to a time when this particular portion of land was regularly cropped for wheat. Much the same is true of the manor at Denbigh, though we are told less about it.

With Astret Oweyn and Dynorbyn Vaur the case was different. Both these manors dated back to the time of the princes. This is shown in the case of the latter manor by the statement that the hamlet of Mayrdreue was in the time of the princes in the hands of nativi, who performed various services and works at the manor of Dynorbyn, but who since the time of the Earl of Lincoln had paid a composition fee of 35*s.* 10*d.* for all their dues.[3] The name of this hamlet suggests an analogy with the entry in the Record of Carnarvon, which runs: 'There is another hamlet called Mairdref. And it is of such a nature that if there were only one sufficient tenant he would be charged with the whole rent.'[4] The joint composition fee for services points to a holding in trefgevery. It seems to be the case that the ploughing and harrowing at Dynorbyn Vaur was done by the three neighbouring vills. It may be that the population of the hamlet of Mayrdreue had diminished or in some way become inadequate for the performance of the services. Thus it would suit the lord of the manor to transfer the actual obligation and in place of it to exact a fixed rent. It is fairly clear who do the ploughing at Dynorbyn Vaur;[5] it is not at all clear who plough the demesne at Astret Oweyn and at Kilforn. It may have been done by the nativi of Segroit. But neither among the customs of the eleven gavells of nativi there, nor among those given at the end of the commote, is there any mention of ploughing or harrowing services, and yet Kaymergh is the most anglicized part of the whole honour.

In the two manors which have their arable in three seasons, the different seasons are fairly well balanced against one another. In Dynorbyn Vaur the figures are in the first season 67 acres 15 perches, in the second 64 acres 1 rood 30 perches, in the third 60 acres 2 roods 31 perches.[1] At Kilforn the figures are roughly 69 acres, 71 acres, and 101 acres.[2] Evidently the quality of the acre is not so uniform here as at Dynorbyn. At Astret Oweyn the value of the individual acre is given in part at 8*d.* and in part at 10*d.*, and Astret Oweyn is definitely said not to be in three seasons.[3] The figures at Dynorbyn Vaur and Kilforn are 14*d.* and 12*d.* the acre respectively. The value of the acre at Denbigh is still higher, viz. 16*d.*, and it is not stated that there the arable lay in three seasons. It lies in four portions, each in a different field. The acreages are 8 acres 3 roods 20 perches, 15 acres 3 roods 20 perches, 16 acres 3 roods 38 perches, 33 acres 2 roods 34 perches.[4] If we assume that the first and second or the first and third are in the same season we get a proportion as among the seasons not differing widely from the proportion at Kilforn. At Dynorbyn Vaur, however, there are two acres all but a perch, of which it is said that they can be sown in any year and their value is 19*d.* an acre.[5] Thus we have a scale of value ascending from 8*d.* to 19*d.* per acre; at both ends of this the land is not in three seasons, the middle values alone representing land under that system. If the values give any clue at all to the relative advantages of the different systems, we must assume that roughly half the arable at Astret Oweyn lay fallow each year; that the manor at [5] f. 214. This is a survival of the more primitive agriculture. Both Dynorbyn and Astret Oweyn were manors in the time of the princes; both show survivals, the one much more fully than the other, of the earlier methods of cultivation. The mention of the 'Whitefeld' at Kilforn—a manor English in origin—would seem to suggest that the new centralizing units were at first established on the basis of the old tribal agriculture and only gradually transformed the latter towards improved conditions.

[1] f. 214. [2] f. 3. [3] f. 2. [4] f. 48.

Denbigh was really under three seasons; lastly, that the high value of the two acres at Dynorbyn Vaur is explained by the fact that they were cropped in toto every year, and were kept outside the three seasons because their fertility promised a higher return for a period of years.

Where the land does lie in three seasons it is remarkable how in each season there are 2 furlongs, 2 pieces, 2 culturae, &c. This may be pure coincidence, but perhaps there was some idea of precluding a bad or thin crop by dividing the wheat land, the oat land, &c., into two portions.

Giraldus Cambrensis has described Anglesey as 'Mater Kambriae' because her greater fertility enabled her to augment when necessary the deficient supplies of the Welsh mainland. The manors established in the Honour of Denbigh were no doubt expected by their lord to turn this deficiency to account as a source of income. In the Court Rolls of Ruthin we read that wheat, barley, and oats are always being stolen; the owner has always an English name, the thief a Welsh one. In this connexion the history of the hamlet of Brenbagle in the commote of Kaymergh is interesting.[1] In the time of the Earl of Lancaster the hamlet was granted to eight Englishmen, and was to be held in herbagio. No sooner had they driven their bargain than the tenants, looking to a good source of income, turned 160 acres out of 420 into arable, and this against the letter of the agreement. This seems to show that the lord was anxious to exclude competition, and the English settlers were as eager to share in monopoly profits.

In the case of Astret Oweyn there is mention of due crofte incluse circa manerium, which contain 4 acres 3 roods and 4 perches.[2] Their close proximity to the manor buildings suggests a tempting analogy with the croft-land or in-field on thirteenth-century manors in Scotland. This croft-land, the best land in the manor, was that part of the arable nearest to the farm-town, was divided into three or four sections under a more or less complex rotation of crops, and was often distinguished as the 'bear' land from the out-field known as the 'oat' land. But later on in the Extent we find that the two crofts at Astret Oweyn were originally in the hands of nativi, who were ousted by means of exchange, and given crofts and cottages elsewhere.[1] These nativi may in their time have cropped the crofts, which in the economy of the manor were being used for pasture, serving, no doubt, the purposes of the strip of permanent pasture lying just outside the buildings on so many of our modern farms and employed as a cow-park. This origin suggests an analogy with the crofts of the townships in the north-west Highlands of Scotland. The arable of these small settlements might be worked in runrig or divided into crofts, nor was it unusual to have a combination of the two systems.

The meaning of the word croft is not so clear in the Welsh evidence as in the Scottish. The two instances which occur in the Black Book of St. Davids give us no help. All that Mr. Willis-Bund can say is that '"Croft" seems a general term with no fixed meaning'. In the original documents printed in the Surveys of Gower and Kilvey, crofts are continually mentioned among the individual holdings, but clausurae terrae arabilis are still more often referred to, and the valuation of the latter exceeds that of the former usually by four or five times. Remembering the statement of Giraldus that the population was usually to be found not so much in compact settlements as scattered up and down through the woods, we may conclude that the holding of a taeog was often a croft, and this tended to become more common, as contact with the English broke up the groups holding in treweloghe and trefgevery.

Another term that calls for explanation is friscum. It occurs in various forms: friscum, vetus friscum, debile friscum, le frith. It seems to denote uncultivated land used for either meadow or dry pasture. It is a question whether this land had ever been cultivated. Acres of it lay scattered up and down the arable fields, and were said non valent converti cum ceteris seisonis terre arabilis propter debilitatem.[2] Does not this context suggest that these portions had become barren through being continually cropped under a wasteful one-field system? Again, wherever terra frisca is put to pasture it is classed as dry pasture. Were it classed as pastura profunda, this would ordinarily exclude the possibility of its ever having been under cultivation. In the enumeration of the dry meadow-lands of Kilforn, reference is made to a part que solet esse terra arabilis et nunc ordinatur pro pastura boum. Certainly the term friscum is not definitely applied to this area, but the very next item is described as vetus friscum.[1] A series of very interesting uses of the word frith occurs in the Record of Carnarvon. Two escheated bovates in a certain wele are said to lie frith in manu domini pro defectu tenentis. Another entry runs: Predictum Wele de Wele Meur' ap David iacet frith. Et solebat reddere quolibet termino iis. ob. q. There is reference to a certain garden called Garth Mad' ap Ior' Duy which also lies uncultivated in the hands of the lord.[2] The next entry is so important that it must be given in full: In eadem villa sunt octo bovate terre de terra dominica domini que iacent frith in manu domini de quibus Ringyll, qui pro tempore fuit, oneratur quolibet anno et reddit xxs.[3] The united force of these entries would seem to favour the possibility that frith or frisc-land may in some cases have previously been arable land. The official mentioned in the last entry appears in the Ancient Laws as a subordinate of the canghellor, and, in another context, 'ought to have his land free.'[4] The conjecture may be offered that he was laden with the rent of these eight bovates of frith, because the lord had been in receipt of a considerable revenue from this land when in cultivation, and in order to recoup himself chose the fittest shoulders for the burden.

However this may be, the word frith survives in Wales to-day as applied to rough enclosed ground lying between the in-field and the moorland and used for pasture. The meaning of the word has become fixed in this use, which is probably different from its original signification. This high ground near the moorland might well have been the cultivated land of tribesmen in the distant past, when the land in runrig hung on the slopes of the hills. The marks of this ancient agriculture are to be found on the hill-sides both in Wales and Scotland to-day.

[1] f. 4. For the form 'le frith' see f. 214.

[2] Record of Carnarvon, pp. 56, 55, 50. Incidentally the second entry shows how far the transition from a jurisdiction over groups to territorial jurisdiction had proceeded. The first use of the word 'wele' here indicates the land occupied by the group.

[3] Ibid., p. 18.

[4] Ancient Laws of Wales, i. 64, 188, 392; cf. below, p. lxxix.

It is significant that on the Ordnance Survey Maps of Denbighshire there are scores of place-names compounded with 'frith', and that as a rule the contour lines passing through such areas vary from 600 to 1,200 feet.

About tribal agriculture beyond the survivals already noticed the Extent tells us little. Its essentially primitive nature may be inferred from evidence adduced in the earlier part of this essay. Giraldus tells us that the Welshman yoked either two, or more usually four, oxen to his plough. He gives prominence to the cultivation of oats, for which the ground was ploughed once a year in March or April. Where wheat was grown, winter tilth was necessary. In the Laws reference is made to winter tilth and spring tilth. Claims to land were barred during seed-time and harvest. There were also Laws providing for the distribution of erws among the co-tillagers, and for the assessment of corn damage. On few of these points does the Extent throw any light. One entry, however, beyond those already noticed seems worthy of mention. It deals with the services of ploughing and harrowing done by the nativi of Meynyot, Kylkydok, and Dynorbyn Vaghan.[1] The individual nativus paid according as he had a plough or merely a share in a plough. The implication seems to be that some nativi had ploughs of their own. These individuals may have fared to such a position as to have ploughless nativi or even freemen in their service, and so would be able to plough without co-partnership all the strips or parcels in their holdings. Again, some of these ploughs might be two-ox ploughs employed by the nativi who are mentioned as holding placee in these vills. In either case, the decay of the communal element seems to be indicated. The nativi of these vills still held in weles, and on the land in treweloghe co-tillage would continue to exist. But many also held acres and placee. Beside the old communal organization, an individual element seems to be springing up. In the St. Davids record we see how in many parts the new system has displaced the old—the whole population of some vills holding in curtilages, plots, and crofts. The Denbigh Survey typifies an earlier stage in the transition.

RENTS AND SERVICES

FROM the point of view of rents and services the population of the Denbigh vills was divided with singular distinctness into two classes: on the one hand the Welsh tenants, the 'true heirs', who held their land on old customary conditions, and on the other the newer Welsh and English tenants who held the land escheated since the conquest more Anglice, as the bailiffs called it, that is to say, by some form of agreement with the lord. The latter had no share in the obligations of the older Welsh tenants; their dues to the lord were separately recorded in the account rolls by special bailiffs in the form of rents of escheated lands, and rents for castle-guard at Denbigh[1] with perquisites of courts, among which the relief and merchet payments had close counterparts in the Welsh ebediw and amobyr.

The rents and services incumbent upon the 'true heirs', the older Welsh tenants, while in the main uniform and of regular incidence within the group of free tenants, and, in a less degree, within the group of nativi, were yet subject to some variations. Thus the nature of the obligations differed a little in different commotes, food-rents and agricultural services being more common in Ysdulas and Ughdulas than in Kaymergh—the commote most exposed to English influences; and, again, occasional irregularities occurred from villata to villata, especially in the liability to the butter rent. The most important variations, however, were the result of the exemption of individuals or groups of individuals from all or part of the ordinary obligations of the villata. Such variations were of three kinds.

Special privileges were sometimes granted by the prince to important free priodors. In some cases these exemptions were the result of purchase or of some equivalent given by the priodor. Thus extensive privileges were granted to the Wyrion Eden',

[1] See, for example, Ministers' Accounts, 1182–91 (4 Edward III), 'Compotus Henrici Yokehesale Ballivi Anglorum,' for the commote of Kaymergh; and 1182–4 (34 Edward III), in which the perquisites of courts held for Welsh and English are separately recorded in the roll for Yssalet under the headings: 'Compotus Ken' Vaghan Ring' ibidem' and 'Compotus Roberti de Halond Ballivi inter Anglos in dominio Domini Principis'; see also 1183–9, in which seventeen courts held among the English are mentioned. Cf. f. 280, 'et hoc intelligendum est de Wallensibus et non de Anglicis.'

a progeny of which the Survey has much to say. The Wyrion Eden' comprised a portion of the descendants of Edred ap Marghuyd, namely the sons, grandsons, great-grandsons, and their co-parceners, of Iorwerth, son of Goug', son of Idenerth, one of the four sons of Edred. Seven generations are thus enumerated in the Survey behind the generation actually occupying the soil. Iorwerth held his tenements like others of the Marghuyd progeny, and paid his share of the tunk, but upon his son and heir, Ken', Prince Llewelyn conferred special privileges freeing all his lands in Wales from tunk and all other service whatsoever except military service in time of war and suit of court.[1] These privileges were enjoyed by Ken's three sons, their heirs and co-parceners, for Ken's wele wherever it occurred, namely in Dynorbyn Vaghan,[2] Abergele,[3] Brenfanyk,[4] Toronoth,[5] Laethenayn,[6] Tuennan,[7] and Loydcoyd,[8] except for the share of Gron' ap Heilin ap Ken', who died against the peace and forfeited both his portion of Iorwerth's wele, held in dominio et servicio, and also his lands acquired per viam tyrpride.[9] The case of the Wyrion Eden' serves as an excellent example of privilege, and also as an indication that the heads of other great progenies mentioned in the Survey may have been, like Marghuyd or Edred his son, many generations behind the actual occupiers of tenements or holders of rights who appear in the Survey. An exemption similar to that of the Wyrion Eden' was probably enjoyed by the Wyrion Edden' Vaghan at Thlessalet, and by Eignon Vaghan at Rue.[10]

Secondly, certain passages seem to indicate that land might be held in mesne of Denbigh by the Church, whereby a bishop, abbot, or other ecclesiastical lord was interposed between the lord of Denbigh and the tenant, with a share of the rents and dues reserved to him. Thus may be explained the position of the 'bishop's tenants' mentioned in the common customs of Kaymergh and Yssalet,[11] who still paid the pastus of the two satellites pacis with the rest of the commote, but were probably exempt from other dues to the lordship, and also that of those tenants in Guythheryn who divided their rents, their albadeth, amobyr, and relief, between two lords, Denbigh and the mysterious 'abbots of the progeny of Canon ap Lauwargh'', in a manner recalling the passages relating to Church lands in the Venedotian Code.[1]

More numerous were cases of privilege of a third kind where uniformity of obligations had been broken by the commutation of certain rents of the free and nativi into a fixed annual sum called 'ardreth' or 'treth'. That such is the meaning of the common treth or ardreth is clearly established by several passages in the Survey. In Penporghethl' a gavell gave 10*d.* for tunk and pro ardreth, videlicet pro omnibus aliis serviciis eis arentatis preter pastum satellitum pacis et forestariorum, ijs. per annum.[2] A similar passage occurs in the description of Kylkydok: pro omnimodis aliis serviciis eis arentatis a tempore conquestus vs. de ardreth.[3] 'Treth' was probably another form for ardreth. It is used of the commutation of the butter rent of nativi[4] and again commonly of the pastus Principis of the free tenants.[5] The treth or ardreth did not in any case include the tunk. In Nanthyn Sanctorum and in Guythheryn, however, the two vills in which Canon ap Lauwargh's progeny had holdings, the tunk was commuted with the treth and the resulting fixed annual rent is called 'albadeth', paid at All Saints and the Invention of Holy Cross.[6] In Nanthyn Sanctorum opposite the All Saints receipt is written loco tung, opposite the Holy Cross receipt loco treth. A distinction between ardreth and albadeth is usually consistently maintained; in the summary of rents received from the whole commote of Yssalet,[7] for example, the Harleian manuscript inserts an item omitted from the Maitland manuscript: Summa ardreth xxxvijs. vjd. q., which is evidently obtained by adding the ardreth of the Denbigh nativi to the ardreth of Penporghethl', and excluding the albadeth of Nanthyn Sanctorum. The albadeth of Guythheryn was a large and important rent paid both by those weles already mentioned whose rents were divided between the abbots of the progeny of Canon ap Lauwargh and the lord of Denbigh, the proportion of their relief and amobyr fines paid over to the lord of Denbigh being secundum participacionem eorum albadeth, and by other weles over which he had integrum dominium.[1] Such commutation of services and rents for fixed annual sums was not necessarily by recent arrangement. In Nanthyn Sanctorum the vetus ardreth of the time of the princes is twice mentioned,[2] and occasionally elsewhere the rent is referred to the time of the conquest.[3]

The normal rents and services from the ordinary unprivileged tenants, free and nativi, appear repeatedly in the Survey in the descriptions of certain typical vills and in the common customs entered at the end of each commote.[4] Other full descriptions are given in the series of Ministers' Accounts of Denbigh, among which a roll of 34 Edward III [5] is especially valuable, for in that year the Honour went into the hands of the Black Prince, after the death of Roger Mortimer and during the minority of his son, and much more detailed accounts were kept than during the preceding period.

While the services and obligations of the Welsh tenants, as they appear in these documents, have assumed, as a rule, a money form, even food rents having been turned into equivalent money payments, yet the original service or food rent is usually still clearly indicated behind the money payment, and gives evidence, for the time of the princes at least, of a state of society with hardly any resemblance to manorial conditions at all, and in which even the trevgyvriv form of nativi settlement, or indications of the maertrev, were only very occasional,[6] a state of society of which English rents of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries show only reminiscences much obscured by the interposition of manorial custom. These rents and occasional services of the Survey may best be classified according to the nature of the original obligations which they represent, and considered thus they fall naturally into several groups; yet, as will appear from a study of the rents, the lines of division so formed are cut by the lines of two other important divisions, namely, by the division according to the incidence of rents on free and nativi, and by a second less consistent division according to the method of assessment. The division of the rents according to their character and origin is as follows: (1) Tunk, (2) Pastus rents, (3) Food rents, (4) Agricultural rents, (5) Maintenance of mills and houses, (6) Herbage, pannage, and the profits of the forest, (7) Perquisites of courts, including fines and dues levied on special occasions, such as relief and amobyr, (8) Military service, castle guard, and suit of court.

1. Tunk. Tunk is entered in the Survey beside almost every unprivileged tenement of free or nativi held by the 'true heirs', but without explanation. It was still paid when other services were commuted for ardreth. In the account rolls it occupies usually a special position, being given a heading by itself, or placed among the redditus assise, and not among the usual consuetudines. Unfortunately the period covered by the very full roll of 34 Edward III[1] does not include the term of All Saints, at which the tunk was invariably due, and accordingly we have only the note: De redditu vocata Tunk soluta ad festum Omnium Sanctorum non respondit quia dictus terminus solucionis non accidit infra tempus huius compoti. The origin of the payment of tunk is shown in the Laws, and has been discussed by Mr. Seebohm.[2] The chief information given by the Laws may be recapitulated briefly as follows: the Venedotian Code describes the food rent or gwestva due to the king from a free maenol as a rent paid in kind—in mead, flour, butter, and meat, or in an equivalent money rent called the tunk-pound, to the 240 pence of which the values of the ale, bread, and other foods of the gwestva were assigned proportionately. It was collected by the silentiary, and in addition to it was due a supper-silver of twenty-four pence to be distributed among certain of the king's officers. From the bond maenol two food rents called 'dawnbwyds' were due, one in summer, one in winter, described in detail, and consisting of butter, bragot, instead of mead, and the like.[1] Elsewhere the Laws state that the men of the maertrev are to pay the tunk into the hands of the landmaer.[2] No tunk was due from land in trefgevery, however, 'because there is no obligation to give supper from it. Progresses of dogs, horses, and quarters are due from a register trev; and, therefore, they are not to supply the lord therefrom.'[3] The Dimetian and Gwentian Codes describe similar food rents, agreeing in the statement that the gwestva was due once a year from the free and two food rents from the nativi.[4] Other passages in the Laws show the common occurrence of the tunk. Thus, possession for four generations, with payment of tunk and ebediw, ensures inheritance of Church lands;[5] again, a lord receives from his men amobyr, ebediw, tunk, gwestvas, provender and work from the men that work.[6] Tunk is one of the three exclusives of a man which he does not share with his wife, enabling him to join the army.[7] In the Denbigh Survey the tunk is a definite money charge on all Welsh customary tenants, free and nativi, except those paying albadeth and those specially exempted—if the free gavells of Kaymergh and the nativi of the one vill in trefgevery may be included in this last group.

The tunk seems then to have been a general contribution originally made to the king for public purposes, and the method of its assessment should help to throw light upon the unit of taxation among the Welsh in the days of the princes. The statements of the Laws seem to point to an artificial system, apparently territorial in character, and imposed from above. Thus the tunk-pound in the Venedotian Code is due from the maenol, which is made up of four trevs, and a trev of four randirs, and a randir of four tyddins, and a tyddin of four erws. To the cymwd went twelve maenols, upon not all of which apparently was the tunk-pound incident, for four of the twelve were assigned to aillts for horses' and dogs' progresses and dovraeth, from which four maenols the king was not to be supported, but in them the maer and canghellor were to have progresses; two of the twelve were assigned to the maer and canghellor, and six to free uchelwrs, and from these eight the tunk was due.[1] From the Denbigh Survey any exemption like that of the four maenols is absent, and the tunk may be incumbent on all land of free and nativi alike, except perhaps on land in trefgevery. The territorial divisions referred to in the Laws, moreover, do not occur in the Survey in connexion with the tunk. There is, however, some evidence of the existence in the time of the princes of a system very artificial and in a sense territorial in character.

There are several vills of which the whole assessment tempore Principum—the ancient assessment, that is to say, before any portions of the gavells escheated—is given by the surveyors as a round sum, either a tunk-pound, as the Laws would call it, or a fractional part of it, a half, a third, or a fourth part. Many other vills yield like results if their original tunk be reconstructed from the amount still paid on the unescheated parts of gavells at the time of the Survey, their assessments appearing as 240*d.*, 120*d.*, 80*d.*, 60*d.*, or even 40*d.* and 30*d.* For some vills the evidence of the Survey is insufficient to determine the original tunk because where whole gavells had escheated their old assessment was not stated; the tunk of certain other vills amounts to a sum which apparently bears no relation to 240*d.* In spite of these exceptions, however, there is probably enough evidence to prove that there was usually some rude equation between the amount of tunk paid by a vill and a whole tunk-pound or its fractional part. The best results are shown by vills held by one progeny or in even parts by several progenies, especially in the commote of Ughdulas. Kaymergh is very irregular, but there the free gavells paid no tunk and the nativi may have been assessed on a different system.

When, however, an attempt is made to understand the adjustment of the tunk within the vill the matter does not seem to be so clear. Was the amount of tunk which a man paid determined only by the relation his tenement would bear to the total assessment of the individual vill in which it lay, or was it determined by some other factor also? The difficulty does not appear clearly in the vills in the hands of one progeny; here it is apparent that the division of gavells among sons and grandsons caused equal divisions, as a rule, in the tunk also, the final co-heirs and participes paying inter se the burden on their share of the vill which was also, in some cases, at least, their share in the tunk of the whole progeny. The assessment of Rand Vaghan ap Asser, at the beginning of Ughalet,[1] cannot be explained so easily. His descendants to the third generation are described as holding five vills entire, one-half of a sixth vill, one-third of a seventh, and one-thirteenth of an eighth, paying in each vill either the whole tunk due from the vill (which does not in the first five vills work out clearly to fractions of a pound), or else that exact proportion of the whole tunk which is proper to their share of the vill, that is to say, in their half-vill, a 40*d.* vill, they pay 20*d.*, in their third of a vill, a 60*d.* vill, they pay 20*d.*, in their thirteenth of a vill, also a 60*d.* vill, they pay 4½*d.* In the last case they hold their tenement quasi pro uno lecto quod vocatur Wele Wyrion Rand, and there are twelve other lecta of other progenies, nine paying 4½*d.* each, and three paying 5*d.* each. From reading this much of the Survey it would be supposed that each of Rand Vaghan's gavells paid at the rate of 4½*d.*; but this conclusion is too hasty, for the Survey goes on to state the whole tunk on each gavell of grandsons, irrespective of the vill in which it is paid, and if the total tunk, tempore Principum, be reconstructed, it will be found to equal one pound and 16*d.*, distributed with the utmost uniformity among the lecta of sons and gavells of grandsons. Thus the four lecta of sons each paid 64*d.*; two of these lecta, of four gavells each, paid 16*d.* a gavell—in all 128*d.*; and two lecta, of two gavells each, paid 32*d.* a gavell—in all 128*d.* The rate on Rand's grandsons, that is to say, irrespective of the vills in which their gavells were held, was 16*d.* a gavell where there were four gavells in the lectum, and 32*d.* a gavell where there were two gavells in the lectum, the total amount being equal to one tunk-pound plus 16*d.* The Survey states further that from this sum are to be 'extracted' and parcelled out among the vills of the progeny certain smaller sums of tunk, to be paid in each vill, sums which are even proportionate parts not of the tunk of the progeny, but of the tunk at which the vill where they are paid is assessed. In other words, two possible kinds of lectum or gavell seem indicated: one the actual tenement or portion of the vill for which the progeny pays its share of the total assessment of the vill quasi pro uno lecto, for example, $4\frac{1}{2}d.$ in the vill divided between thirteen lecta; and the other an ideal gavell, a subdivision of the kindred holding in all the vills of the progeny, and paying 16*d.* to a larger lectum which in turn pays 64*d.* to a total of one tunk-pound from the whole progeny. Are there then, in cases like Rand Vaghan's, indications of other older conditions where progeny rather than vill was the unit of the tunk? A passage in the Laws seems to support such a contention. The Dimetian Code[1] states that 'the chief of a kindred is to give one pound yearly to the lord. Every free man between the feast of All Saints and the feast of S. Martin is to pay to the lord what he is bound to pay.'

Evidence regarding the unit of assessment of the tunk taken from other great progenies of the Survey is not conclusive. The surveyors describe no other tunk-paying progeny as fully as that of Rand Vaghan, and the attempt to reconstruct a progeny completely from its tenements as they are given in different vills is difficult, because it is not always clear to what kindred a given individual should be assigned, proper names often repeating themselves, and also because a progeny may have had other tenements outside the lordship, paying tunk elsewhere. The only rate of tunk that can be obtained in such cases is the rate on tenements in given vills, corresponding to the $4\frac{1}{2}d.$ rate of Rand Vaghan; and the total sum of such amounts for all the vills held by the progeny, or the amounts paid by gavells of smaller groups within the larger kindred, do not appear. Although the results of such reconstructions are necessarily then very incomplete, yet they in no way prove that there may not have been an original assessment on the kindred, and they are of interest in themselves as showing the importance of the principle of the even distribution of the tunk among generations of descendants, a division often so uniform and artificial that it would seem as if it could bear but little relation to the actual tenement or possessions of the individual.[1]

2. Pastus Rents. The pastus rents formed an important group of obligations which, like the tunk, had to do originally with the purveyance rights of the king and his officers, and were incumbent in part on the free exclusively, in part on nativi exclusively, and in part were common to both. For these rents, too, the Laws contain much information, but the application of their statement regarding progresses and provender rents to the later Denbigh conditions is often far from clear.

The most important pastus rent was the pastus Principis, incumbent on free tenants only. This rent cannot be referred back to a progress of the king himself, for the Laws ascribe to him only purely military expeditions,[2] and probably any earlier royal progresses from house to house for entertainment had been already commuted into the gwestva, hence into the tunk-pound—progresses to which the triad showing the king as a supper guest may perhaps refer.[3] The pastus may have had, however, some connexion with the king's household. Under the heading 'Chief of Kindred' it is stated that there is no progress nor dovraeth nor other such burden on the free maenol " except the great progress of the winter ',[4] and under the heading 'Chief of the Household' in the Venedotian Code a very elaborate progress to be held after Christmas is described.[5]

The determination of the method of assessment of the pastus Principis used in the Survey is difficult. Uniformity was apparently lacking. There are occasional evidences of the rating of a number of gavells or lecta at the same fixed annual sum. Thus in Kaymergh each free gavell paid, before portions of it escheated, 11*s.* to the pastus Principis.[6] In Yssalet and elsewhere there are also traces of the assessment of gavells at a fixed and fairly uniform sum,[1] but in many other instances the utmost irregularity seems to have prevailed even in gavells of the same kindred in which the tunk was quite uniform,[2] and in Ughdulas and Ysdulas entirely artificial systems were apparently in use. In Ysdulas the assessment of weles or gavells was in most vills 12*d.* at Christmas and 6*d.*, 7*d.*, and 6*d.* at the other three terms at which the payment was always made, this arrangement being especially clear in Abergele even in cases where the pastus of other vills was paid there every third year;[3] while in Ughdulas a payment was usually made by the free gavells in common in each vill at the three terms, and a Christmas payment by each gavell singly, which latter payment varied in amount, being sometimes the equivalent of the tunk[4] and sometimes roughly equal to the total amount paid at the other three terms.[5] In Tebrith, Mathebrut, Thlan Ourost, and Garthkanannel[6] unusually regular arrangements appear, an even division of the pastus among the kindred holding in the vill being made, but any such constant relation to the progeny or to the tunk was probably an exception. The case of Rand Vaghan's progeny, where there is no apparent reason for the amount of pastus at which a gavell is assessed, is much more normal, and suggests some basis of actual fact in size or value of the gavell as a possible explanation of the variations. In one respect, however, the assessment of the pastus Principis may point back to early conditions. It was paid, not like the tunk at each of the vills in which the progeny had tenements, but usually in one vill of a progeny or subdivision of a progeny only, probably the central vill around which the progeny was grouped, or in which it originated. Thus Tebrith was the central vill of the progeny of Pithle ap Lauwargh' at which the pastus of all his tenements in Prees and elsewhere was paid, Astret Canon of his brother Canon with his curious progeny of abbots, Caervedvennyth of certain of the progeny of Cadugan, Garthkanannel of the children of Runon. The progenies of the various sons of Idenerth ap Edred paid in Abergele, in Kylkeyn, in Barrok, in Meley, and in Mathebrut.

[1] The division of tunk among the children of Marghuyd, to whom the Wyrion Eden' belonged, is a good example. Thus the four lecta of sons of Edred ap Marghuyd (see Table II) held (1) one-fourth of Abergele, one and a half gavells to each lectum, at 15*d.* each lectum, = 60*d.*; (2) one-third of Loydcoyd at 15*d.* each lectum, = 60*d.*; the two sons of Ithel ap Edred held all Mathebrut, each in the gavells of his sons, at 60*d.* each, = 120*d.*; the three sons of Bleth' ap Edred held all Kylkeyn, tunk irregular; the grandchildren of Idenerth ap Edred held all Toronoth in five lecta paying 1½*d.* each, and all Laethenayn in five lecta paying 16*d.* each. For the holdings of the Wyrion Eden' see the descendants of Ior' ap Goug' ap Idenerth ap Edred in the Table above quoted.

Corresponding to the pastus Principis of the free was the pastus famulorum (familiae, famuliae) Principis, paid by the nativi exclusively. In the Laws, the main duty of providing for the king's officers and household is thrown on the aillts, and from all progresses, as has been said, except that of the winter, the free were exempt. 'Neither maer nor canghellor is to be imposed on a free maenol, nor progress, nor dovraeth, nor vouths . . . except the great progress of the household in winter.'[1] The progress of the maer and canghellor among the nativi is, however, mentioned in the three Codes; they are to make a progress in parties of four among the king's aillts twice a year;[2] the maer has progress among the king's villeins twice a year as one of four;[3] the land-maer has gwestva from the men of the maer-trev.[4] Moreover, the maer and canghellor had in addition to their progresses the privilege of drawing without restriction upon the villeins for their food-supply,[5] a heavy burden which would impoverish many prosperous nativi, and liability to which would serve as an important means of distinguishing the unfree from the free. Of such progresses and purveyance rights the pastus famulorum (famuliae) Principis in the Survey is probably a late form. It was paid at four terms in the year in all commotes except Ughalet, where a definite exemption from the rent is mentioned.[6] The assessment of the pastus was usually on the gavell or tenement.

Other pastus rents were evidently survivals of the curious progresses of horses among the taeogs. Thus the horses of the king, queen, and servants were to have a progress in winter among the king's taeogs, according to the Laws,[7] which usually state also that the various officers of the court were to receive provender for their horses. The pastus duorum dextrariorum et duorum garcionum Principis[8] was incumbent upon the nativi of all commotes of Denbigh except Ughalet. In Kaymergh it was paid at the rate of 13½*d.* a gavell from nineteen gavells and a half-gavell and a third of a gavell of nativi, and amounted to 22*s.* 3*d.*; in Yssalet it was paid by individuals at the rate of 5*d.* each; in Ysdulas and Ughdulas it was paid by nativi who did not pay butter, to the amount of 8*s.* 4*d.* in Ysdulas, and twice as much in Ughdulas. Another exclusively villein pastus was that of the horse of the raglot, and of the boy that cared for it, which is explained more clearly in the rolls of Cardiganshire commotes quoted by Mr. Seebohm. Thus in the commote of Meuenerth 'j garcio et j equo (sic) Raglou debet sustentari infra dictum commotum', the maintenance being valued at 2*d.* a day.[1] Again, 'dicunt quod unus garcio et unus equus Raglou, scilicet ballivi patrie, debet sustentari.'[2] The raglot appears regularly among the officers of the commotes in the farms of bailiwicks entered in the account rolls. In the Denbigh Survey the rate of this pastus was usually 4*d.* on each nativus. In Ysdulas it was paid only by those nativi who did not pay butter. Another pastus of a horse was paid by free and nativi alike, the pastus stalonis and of the boy with it. The Survey gives some account of the history of this rent.[3] The boy and the horse used to be kept a day and a night at each house, and this service, according to an old Extent, was valued at 2½*d.*, but at the time of the present Survey only 1*d.* was paid by each tenant.

Still other pastus dues are clearly survivals of hunting progresses. The Dimetian Code describes the two progresses a year of the chief huntsman and his retinue among the king's taeogs, one in the spring, and one in the autumn.[4] The falconer, too, had a progress, and certain grooms.[5] The falconer's progress appears in later times in Aberffraw and in Cardiganshire,[6] but has been lost in Denbigh; the huntsman's progress has left survivals in the pastus lucrarii cum canibus, paid in all Denbigh commotes by free and nativi alike, at the rate of 1*d.* a person, and with this rent is usually connected the pastus pennackewe et waission bagheyn, of the chief page and young men in fosterage, paid at the rate of a halfpenny a person, as if the two groups were closely connected and had made up a hunting party in the past.

Another less common hunting rent is mentioned in Ughdulas, both in the account roll and in the Survey,[1] called the pastus waission cum leporariis. These Welsh hunting rents help to throw light on some obscure English rents and on the common burden of feeding men and dogs borne by the villeins of certain churches.[2]

Two other pastus rents are usually described together in the Survey, the pastus forestariorum, and the pastus of the two 'satellites', or serjeants of the peace. The foresters, of whom there were usually two, and the peace officers came often to the commote. The coidars' or foresters' rolls were kept for each commote each year,[3] and the numbers of courts held by them was usually the same as the number of regular commote courts, and the amount of their perquisites, with the exitus of the forests, a very fair proportion of the total perquisites. The maintenance of these public officers was not always commuted; they were still sometimes entertained by the commote, the value of a day's entertainment being 2*d.* or 3*d.* from each tenant.[4] In Yssalet the free evidently tried to escape the burden, but unsuccessfully.[5] Extortions of foresters and bailiffs were a common grievance in English hundreds also, where their requisitions of food were no longer regarded as just.

3. Food Rents. Closely allied with the pastus rents were certain rents in some cases still paid in kind, in others commuted by the time of the Survey for equivalent money payments. These rents varied in number from commote to commote, being heaviest in Ughdulas and lightest in Kaymergh, and they were paid by the nativi only.[6]

A rent of oats was always paid, perhaps as a survival of some of the old dues of provender for horses. In Kaymergh the rate was one crannock, worth 8*d.*, to the gavell, called gavella terre in the account rolls, paid at Easter, and the total reached nineteen crannocks or 13*s.* 2½*d.* and ⅔ of a farthing from thirty-one nativi. In Yssalet the rate was 8*d.* a plough, the number of ploughs in the commote being usually fourteen. The rate in Ysdulas was probably the same as in Kaymergh.

Of more interest is the puzzling butter rent. It is clear from the description of Ysdulas that the liability to pay butter was in some way a mark of division among the nativi. Those who were liable to it, perhaps the dairy farmers, rendered one set of services, paid to the support of houses, and made certain arrangements regarding the mill; those who were not liable, rendered other services, paid the pastus of the horse of the raglot and of the dextrarius, compounded for the office of reeve, and made different arrangements regarding the mill.[1] In Ughalet nativi paying butter held a special position, being exempt from pastus rents except that of the foresters.[2] In Kaymergh butter dues do not appear. An interesting description of a butter-paying vill is that of Kylkenneys in Ughdulas. It was in the hands of two pairs of brothers and one other nativus; it paid neither tunk nor treth, nor did other service than three days' work at harvest and maintenance of the mill. If one of the five holders alone were left to hold the vill, he paid a certus redditus of butter only, namely six vasa and one pygyn, or 30*s*. 3*d*.[3]

A rent common in Kaymergh, Ysdulas, and Ughdulas, from which the nativi of Ughalet were exempted, was the Christmas hen, valued at a penny. In Penmaen and Lassemayn, two vills added late to the Honour, the custumarius if he had two hens gave one to the lord; if he had only one cock and one hen he gave nothing.[4] The Christmas hen is almost always found among the obligations of English villeins, although usually in connexion with estover privileges, and appears again in Scotland as the reek hen or cain fowl.[5]

In Ysdulas the nativi owed also heavy rents of dishes of grain or wheat, disci farine, due at All Saints, one discus being valued at a halfpenny; and in addition to this they owed eggs and lambs at Easter, twenty-four eggs being valued at a penny and a lamb at 2*d*.[6]

4. Rents arising from agricultural services. The agricultural rents in Denbigh were few and small. The most common, found in all commotes, was the payment for three autumn works made by each nativus with land, or by a gavella terre, commuted at 4½*d.* and paid at the Assumption. The rent amounted in Yssalet to 18*s.* from forty-eight nativi owing one hundred and forty-four works, in Ughdulas to 13*s.* 10*d.* for one hundred and eleven works. In Ysdulas there was a question raised regarding the rents for harvest works and Christmas hens, the nativi without houses, not 'sitting on land', declaring that they ought not to be liable, but the decision seems to have gone against them.[1] In one commote only is there a reference to rents from other clearly agricultural services. In Ysdulas a plough gave 3*d.* at Christmas for arura, and 1*d.* for herciatura. A nativus holding less than a plough paid proportionately less.[2] The extent to which the commutation of agricultural services was carried is curious, and, unless it was in the main the result of the English conquest, seems to preclude the possibility of the formation of demesne land in Welsh vills by natural means. The reaping and ploughing services resemble the very early English services of gavolerth and gavolrep, which lingered in parts of England to a late day under manorial arrangements.

Carting services are occasionally mentioned. In Ughalet and Ughdulas,[3] carriage was performed in connexion with the mill, meremium supplied by the lord and mill-stones being carted by the tenants. If food were bought at the lord's need, the nativi of the commote were bound to take it to Denbigh, but not elsewhere.[4]

Another service, pastoral rather than agricultural, was the setting up of hedges for the fencing of cattle around the lord's curia, a service common in the commotes. In Yssalet it is stated that the commutation of this service took place in the time of the Earl of Lincoln.[5]

With the rents from these services may be included the fines paid for exemption from the office of reeve, a rent similar to which appears in England. The nativi of the commote paid in common a certain sum, usually 20*s.*,[6] in order that the reeveship might not fall upon one of their number. The large amount of the payment shows the unpopularity of the office in Wales, as in England, as an incident of villeinage. With liability to this office may be grouped certain other restrictions on nativi, which recall certain English customs. Thus in Yssalet,[1] when the lord was about to come into the commote, the nativus might not sell his ox, his cow, or any beast, his corn, or ale, or any food but cheese and butter, without offering it first to the bailiff or provisores of the lord. Sometimes, too, it is stated that the villeins must grind at the lord's mill,[2] paying the sixteenth vas for multure, and si alibi molent absque licencia per misericordiam domini puniendi sunt. Regulations regarding folding at the lord's fold would be rendered unnecessary by the method of managing the waste. The restrictions on sales and the mill soke appear in the Laws.[3]

5. Services for the maintenance of houses and mills. In each commote there was a central or important vill in which houses had to be maintained—in Kaymergh at Astret, in Yssalet at Denbigh, in Ysdulas at Dynorbyn. The houses to be constructed and kept in repair in Denbigh are enumerated,[4] and correspond very closely with the lists given in the Laws.[5] The rate of commutation of the service varied a little. In Kaymergh free and nativi paid 1½*d.* each, in Yssalet free and nativi paid a penny each, while in Ysdulas 6*s.* 8*d.* was given by all nativi who paid butter. The maintenance of the mill was a heavier burden, paid usually at the rate of 4*d.* a nativus. Sometimes the mill was entirely or in part the lord's, sometimes it belonged to certain gavells, sometimes to the community of the vill.[6] In Ughdulas the service due at the mill consisted in keeping the earthwork in repair and in carting wood except the wood used for wheels and axles, but it did not include carting mill-stones.[7]

In the assessment of these minor pastus dues and consuetudines, the relation of the individual to the kindred is disregarded in the Survey, the convenient unit of the terram tenens, the individual with land, or the householder, or, occasionally, the holder of the whole or part of a plough,[1] or simply the individual, being used. The tenement of the terram tenens had not, however, acquired any standard areal content; at least, no such content is indicated in the Survey, where the tenement of the individual is seldom if ever reduced to a number of acres. Yet although the actual acreage held by the tenant, sive magis tenuerit sive minus, was apparently of no importance in liability to rents, the assessment shows very clearly gradations in importance among the free and nativi. It allows for the possibility of a free priodor or even of a nativus having tenants under him,[2] one of whom he may substitute for himself as responsible for the rent. Thus in Yssalet [3] there were apparently at the time of the Survey one hundred and twenty-six free men with houses, owing a certain pastus, and thirteen of these had seventy-four tenants, and there were fifty-six nativi with houses. In the account roll of 34 Edward III there were fifty-four nativi in all, of whom forty-four had houses and forty-eight had land.[4] Other rents were paid in common by the free and nativi of the commote.

6. Pannage, Herbage, and the Profits of the Forest. The pannage and herbage rents, which would naturally be of great importance in a pastoral district,[5] do not appear as such in Denbigh because of the method of holding the common wood and waste. The lord received a fixed annual rent from the communitas villatae for all its rights in the common, and had therefore no interest in stating the internal arrangements made by his tenants for its use. Hence, except in the few cases of several pasture or of parks there are very few details regarding pasture. The account rolls [6] include some interesting compoti of the parcarius of the parks of Postuy and Castelpark, giving the pannage and herbage rents, and the numbers of animals pastured, and a stock account of the havocarius is added. Ten tenants are mentioned in the Denbigh Survey at Arquedelok, who hold at a heavy rent cows and oxen, to be returned intact at the close of a period of years.[1] As a rule, however, the whole body of pastoral rents and regulations, so interesting in English documents, is hidden under the herbage payment.

The profits of the forest received by the coidars are described in more detail, but were rather fines and occasional payments than regular rents. Several statements are made regarding the right of estovers. It was necessary for the tenant to keep in repair his fences in order to restrain the cattle, and for this purpose he used his several wood, if he had any, or else his shares in the common wood, but before cutting any estovers, taking heybote or housebote from his own or the common wood, he was required to have the permission of the forester.[2] When he needed wood for the maintenance of old fences or the construction of new, he paid a penny to the lord on the 1st of May.[3] Occasional profits of the forest were derived from oak for fuel, croppis, winter agistment, honey, bees, hawks, and the like.

7. Ebediw, Amobyr, and Recognition. The most common fines accounted for among the perquisites of courts are relief and merchet and leyrwite. The Welsh ebediw seems to have resembled rather the heriot than the English relief; it was paid from a man's land or chattels after his death,[4] and not by the heir on entrance to the inheritance. It seems to have been possible, according to the Laws, for the heir to pay cynhasedd on entrance,[5] and so escape his ebediw. Land was sometimes forfeited to the lord through failure to pay, diffyk abedu.[6]

The amobyr fine of the Welsh Laws included both the merchet and leyrwite of the English. It was paid by the woman or her father or relative 'from the privilege of the land she originated in',[7] and it amounted to the ebediw of her father.[8] Weles might be forfeited for diffyk amobr' and held thereafter by the communitas villae or other tenants.[9] Land that would otherwise have descended to illegitimate children was also forfeited.[1] A special officer had charge of amobyr fines.

Although ebediw and amobyr are given English names in the Survey, the principle on which they were based is evidently not the English principle. Instead of being considered, like merchet and heriot, generally characteristic of more servile status, the Welsh fines were due from free and nativi, and were, moreover, usually double for the free man what they were for the nativus. Ebediw and amobyr, in other words, were, like galanas and saraads, the measure of a man's worth: the more important the man the higher his payment. The Welsh Laws give several tables of ebediws and amobyrs graduated on this principle.[2] That the Welsh freeman may sometimes have seen the advantage of the English system for his case is evident; it would appear in the case of tenants like those paying albadeth in Guythheryn who, privileged in other respects and owing military service, paid only five shillings for their relief and merchet—the typical amount due from a nativus—whether relationship were near or far.[3]

Another fine which should probably be included among the perquisites of courts is that for the recognition of villeins who held no land in any vill, like those in Kaymergh and Yssalet, with whom may be classed the adventitious bondmen of Penmaen, who paid pro advocaria sua habenda.[4]

8. Military Service and Suit of Court. Concerning military service and suit of court the Survey says very little beyond ascribing these services to all free priodors of the different commotes.[5] There is nothing to distinguish them from the corresponding English services. Castle-guard is mentioned as due from ten tenants in Yssalet, and its duration is limited to forty days.[6] In the Laws, the military service of freemen on the king's annual expedition is described, and the work on castles due from all but men of the maertrev,[7] but of such older Welsh arrangements, as distinguished from the English, there is no trace in the Survey.

OFFICERS AND AGENTS

THE officials mentioned in the Denbigh Extent represent, of course, a combination of English and Welsh institutions. The officers of higher rank, such as the seneschal, the stewards, the escheators (and extentores), the forestarii, &c., are supplied from English practice. On the other hand, a number of tribal officers survive from the time of Welsh independence. The canghellor and the maer, so often mentioned in the Laws, do not occur in express terms in the Welsh fourteenth-century surveys, although the extents of Anglesey give interesting information as to the maertrev or home-farm. In one case, the manor of Astret Oweyn, we hear of attachments made by the messor, and it is not impossible that this officer combined the duties of the English reeve and of the Welsh maer and of the ringild; but this must remain a conjecture.

The most important office of Welsh origin mentioned in the Survey is that of the Raglot. How far does the raglot of the Denbigh Extent resemble the maer of the Welsh Laws? The Extent gives so few details of his office that there is hardly ground for comparison. The raglot, like the maer, has to pay a substantial fee for his office, ranging from ten shillings to six pounds ten shillings and sixpence, but now the fee is an annual one, not, as in the maer's case, paid only upon the assumption of office. The raglot has a pastus of fourpence from each nativus for his horse, which may be the cylch of the maer. To what extent the raglot shared in the revenues of the commote is not indicated in the Extent, and where in the Laws the maer had substantial claims upon the goods and stock of intestates, the raglot of the Extent has to be satisfied with the corn only, the rest being the lord's property. It must be admitted that there is little here to aid in the identification of the raglot with the maer. We have to seek further information elsewhere. In the Record of Carnarvon, the raglot has a cylch, kilgh raglot as it is called.[1] In some cases he receives not only provender and stabling for his horse, but also a penny or more for his groom for one night's lodging,[2] although the amounts varied. The cylch raglot is paid by the unfree and has become purely a money payment. In the case of the estates of the Bishop of Bangor, the raglot seems to have been appointed by the bishop. He co-operates with the ringild in summoning suitors to appear before the justices of North Wales,[1] he takes view of frankpledge twice a year,[2] and in one case is responsible for work upon the mill.[3] Like the maer of the Laws he sees to the levying of fines: from any fine up to sixpence he takes a penny farthing for himself, and from a fine of a shilling he takes twopence halfpenny and more or less at the same rate for other sums. Like the maer he shares in the ebediw, taking for himself only a tenth (two shillings in every twenty), not a third as did maers and canghellors. He also holds the assize of ale and claims his fee. According to the Black Book of St. Davids, the praepositus in the Vale of Towy held his lands free like the maer, and had a portion of felons' goods. He collected the lord's dues, deducting as his payment dues to which he himself was liable.[4]

There seems enough evidence here to prove that the raglot's office was a development from that of the maer. He is the lord's officer, collecting the lord's rents, taking a share of the ebediw of the villeins, participating in the forfeited goods of intestate bondsmen, holding his land free, but paying for his office, and entitled to a certain measure of sustenance from the lord's villeins. Perhaps the best account of the raglot's duties is given in a much-quoted document dealing with the lordship of Bromfield and Yale.[5] In this account the office closely resembles the maership in its amplest form; it has become of an almost professional nature; and it is likened to the office of sheriff.[6] The raglot works in close connexion with the seneschal, as did the maer with the canghellor. His duties are to make summonses, attachments, arrests in private causes as well as those touching the lord's interests, execution and return of writs, and to present and record them before the seneschal in his court, or before the chancellor, treasurer, or receiver, if the matter should pertain to their jurisdiction. Like the maer he has servants, 'itinerant bailiffs,' to aid him. He has the maer's duty of levying rents and the issues of his office. But this is actually performed by his ringilds, who were not the maer's servants in the Welsh Laws. He is really the inferior of the seneschal and of the other chief ministers.[1]

Among the raglot's perquisites is the cylch or the pasture of his horse, viz. twopence and a measure of oats and straw from the tenants of freemen and from tenantless freemen within his jurisdiction provided they have a beast in the plough, but twopence only from tenants who have no goods or beast for ploughing. He takes fourpence on every load and fourpence on every brew offered for sale in his bailiwick. Where the maer took dirwy and camlwrw, the raglot exacts the eighth penny for himself over and above the amount of fines and amercements which he levies for the court. The maer's perquisite from distraints is represented by fourpence which the raglot of Bromfield and Yale took from the owner of possessions which had been the subject of litigation or had been seized by the lord and subsequently released; and the maer's perquisite from a marwdy corresponds to the wooden and brass utensils, &c., which the raglot there seized for himself from the property of fugitives, felons, and intestates. Here we seem to have a clear identification of the two offices. True, the agricultural functions of the maer, and his services in respect to land distribution and the demarcation of meres and boundaries, do not seem to attach any longer to the office of raglot as here described. But most of these ancient offices changed their character as Wales came under Norman and English domination, until they varied from district to district, and some features lost in Bromfield and Yale may have been retained in other localities of which we are not vouchsafed so detailed a description. At any rate the office of raglot has become one of profit and honour. The king bestows it as a mark of favour upon individuals who have done him signal service. The raglotry of Flint fetches £70 a year at farm. In North Wales the

[1] 'Et seneschallo ac caeteris capitalibus ministris in hiis quae sibi ex parte domini iniungentur intendere [debet],' ibid.

Record of Carnarvon shows us Englishmen, who grabbed at every profitable office after the fall of Llewelyn, eager to hold the raglot's office. The same is true of the districts in the north-eastern marches.

The Raglot advocariae was told off to superintend the affairs of strangers from other lordships and countries, who came to his lord's commote and, in return for the lord's protection and patronage, were willing to become his tenants and render him services similar to those performed by a nativus. They were known as adventitii, or in Welsh alltudion. They were 'born out of the manor or out of the commote . . . by Lawe called straungers'. Such tenants were common in all manorial systems. They were recognized and amply provided for in the Welsh system, for the Welsh records show all too clearly the unsettled state of Wales and the constant movement of Welshmen from district to district, both in the time of their own princes and after. To wandering Welshmen were added foreigners of all kinds, and the Irish alltud is a prominent figure in the Welsh Laws.[1]

In Bromfield and Yale these adventitii entered the lord's advocaria of their own free will and were allowed to remain provided that they had not fled from their homes for any treasonable cause. They could cling to their new homes so long as they behaved well and spoke respectfully to their new lord. In time they might become possessed of their lands.[2] If they had no wish to stay, they were allowed days of grace in which to depart again with their belongings, and, in the Welsh Laws at least, provision was made for their lodging and refreshment on the journey.[3] Otherwise, they might give the new conditions a year's trial, and if no foreign suit were moved against them during that time and they wished to remain under their new lord, they became tenants of the soil, bound to it like ordinary nativi, but liable only to amobyr, heriot, and pastus ragloti advocariae. In the meantime they were placed

[1] Cf. Record of Carnarvon, p. 216.

[2] According to the Welsh Laws they became proprietors by mere flow of time. In the Yale and Bromfield raglotry they could purchase land only by special licence.

[3] But if they remained three days and nights on the lord's land they were ipso facto bound to remain in advocaria unless they had special licence.

under the special protection of the raglot advocariae. They paid him fourpence a year and a bushel of oats for his horse. He received them and arranged with them the rent and services which they were prepared to pay the lord while they remained on his lands.[1] He presented them to the seneschal in the court and kept their names and services inscribed on the court roll. In the border districts they appear to have been mainly craftsmen, smiths, tailors, carpenters, and the like, but elsewhere they might be husbandmen working on the soil. They may have been ignorant of the customs and regulations of the commote and unable to speak the language or dialect of the locality. They needed guidance and protection as well as supervision, or else they would be exposed to loss and injury on all hands. This protection they obtained from their raglot. He had to plead for and defend them in the court, especially in cases of foreign suits urged against them. If they refused to accept his advocacy, they had to pay double the amount of their advocaria and make satisfaction to the lord and his tenants for any grievances which they may have had against them.

The raglot advocariae was thus the supervisor of a special body of villeins standing in special relation to the lord, as was the maer y biswail in the old maertrev. But the raglot advocariae was rather his villeins' representative, standing between them and the law and administration of the commote, and thus resembling the English reeve more than the old land-maer, who was purely a lord's officer. Yet like the land-maer he had a pastus or cylch, and this seems to indicate that like the land-maer he had to 'regulate' the advocaria, and probably had to supervise the farming activities of the adventitii as well as collect their rents, although this is not specifically mentioned in our authorities. There is no mention made of his holding a court like the land-maer, and on the other hand the land-maer had not to perform the raglot's duties of advocate in the commote court, unless we can interpret his obligation to take oath upon all matters pertaining to his maertrev to mean that.

[1] Cf. f. 283: 'Item nullus erit nativus nec aliquis alius adventicius residens inter eos nisi terram teneat, quin det domino per annum pro advocaria sua habenda secundum quod poterit cum senescallo seu ragloto advocarie convenire,' also cited in Record of Carnarvon, p. 90.

Lastly, the land-maer had certain perquisites not accredited to the raglot advocariae, but that may only be due to the fact that our information upon the latter's office is insufficient. At any rate there is sufficient evidence to warrant the view that, even if the raglot advocariae was not a direct descendant of the land-maer, he at least took the land-maer's place among the commote officials.

In some instances the office of raglot advocariae has become elective like that of the reeve. But the office is no longer a desirable one, for the villeins are willing to pay a fine to be relieved of the duty. Its responsibilities probably became too burdensome with the increasing prosperity of Wales, and its perquisites were insignificant in comparison with the money a free labourer could command after the Black Death, and tenants preferred to attend to their own concerns. Had the old Welsh custom still obtained of allowing the maer to support himself at the expense of his neighbour's labour, the case might have been different.

Fairly full information is given us in the Welsh Laws about the Ryghyll (ringildus). The sphere of his activities embraced the whole commote with the exception of the maertrev, where the porter of the palace acted as ringild under the land-maer. The length of his tenure of office is uncertain, but it must have been long, at any rate at a later date, when his duties must have required a clerical training and possible candidates would be few. He was appointed by the canghellor and he is known in the Laws as 'the lord's ringild' and 'the canghellor's servant'.[1]

The ringild seems to have acted in several capacities somewhat different in nature; first, as a watchman in the royal dwelling to guard against fire[2]; secondly, as a court usher; thirdly, as a sort of itinerant bailiff executing summonses; fourthly, as the canghellor's factotum, collecting rents and fines. In the Record of Carnarvon there is an example of the ringild holding his office free of any payment to his lord,[3] but in later times the ringild had to pay an annual fee for his office ranging, in our Extent, from ten shillings to seven pounds three shillings and fourpence. But there is no stipulated fee for the office in the Welsh Laws, where the ringild figures as an inferior officer of the palace, eating with the lesser servants after the lord and superior servants.[1] Nevertheless, he had substantial privileges and perquisites in the Laws. His office made him a freeman.[2] He received food from the household.[3] From every house he visited on business he could claim a loaf and drink.[4] With the lord and canghellor he participated in the privilege of sharing in galanas, and was exempt from that payment himself. He was provided with clothing at the lord's expense:[5] 'He has the shank of every steer from the court to make buskins for himself as high as his ankle. On the ninth day before the calends of winter he receives a coat, a shirt, and a cap and three cubits of linen from the extremity of his elbow to the end of his middle finger to make himself trousers. . . . On the calends of March he has a coat, a shirt, a mantle, and trousers; also in the three chief seasons he has a bonnet.' He shared in the forfeited goods and chattels of fugitives and intestates, taking the odd sheaf of reaped corn, or the headlands of unreaped corn, and all the smaller things that will not keep, the bacon and butter in use, and the green flax and the flaxseed, such utensils as the nether stone of the quern, hatchets and reaping-hooks, and of the animals, the fowls, geese, and cats.[6]

[1] Ancient Laws, i. 448.

[3] Record of Carnarvon, p. 219.

The ringild's duties in the palace have already been mentioned, namely, to guard against fire. As a court functionary, he was both usher and clerk. No court could be held without a ringild. In the court held in the presence of the king, two ringilds stood before him by the side of the pleaders. They had to preserve order, to call silence, but also they had to read out to the court the pleadings of the contending parties. When the judges and priest retired to consider their judgement, they were attended by one of these ringilds; he took no part in their deliberations, but prevented importunate litigants from annoying the judges or influencing their judgement.[7]

[7] See the model court and trial, Ancient Laws, i. 144.

One of the principal duties of the ringild's office was to make summonses and returns to the court.[1] Hence his title 'gwaedd gwlad', 'the cry of a district':[2] 'Two necessary things pertain to the ringild before the authority of the court is exercised, that is, testifying and summoning.' The summons of the ringild was the only valid summons by which a person could be compelled to appear at court, and, on the other hand, the person summoned by the ringild was bound to answer the summons. Only 'flooding water from sea to mountain without a ford or without a bridge thereon, imprisonment, and bedridden disease' could be advanced as lawful excuses for neglecting to answer a summons. And in discharging these or other commissions of the lord or of the court, the ringild might travel on the road or out of the road, a special privilege accorded otherwise only to a priest or doctor hurrying to a sick-bed.

The ringild also filled the part of a modern court bailiff, levying distraints at the instance of the lord and court. For instance, when a judgement granted the property at issue in an action to either of the contending parties, the successful party might take possession with the aid of a ringild. In levying distress he was invested with greater powers than his master or the maer, and even the falconer, who at certain periods was exempt from all other distraints, was at all times liable to be distrained upon by the ringild.[3] Indeed, the ringild seems to have had a measure of privilege expressly withheld from canghellors and maers, that of exercising his powers over free as well as servile.

It was perhaps as a subordinate of the canghellor that the ringild seems to have taken a part as judge. The evidence of this is small. The Laws tell us that the ringild could 'dispose of any plaint brought before him'. At least he assisted the maer and canghellor in determining disputes between trev and trev respecting their boundaries.[4] But here one would only expect him to be acting as the canghellor's servant, summoning the witnesses of the trev and regulating the order of proceedings, as in the case of any other trial. If he discharged judicial functions at all, their nature and extent are shrouded in obscurity, and the ringild's court is an institution never met with in our authorities.

Like all other Welsh offices, that of the ringild experienced changes as time passed. We have seen that the ringilds of Yale and Bromfield levied rents, farms, and the issues of the commote offices, but now are the servants of the raglot.[1] That is to say, the ringild's master was no longer the successor of the canghellor, but the successor of the maer. Our authority for this mentions at the same time that the raglot made executions and return of writs through his 'itinerant bailiff'.[2] If we are to regard the bailiff and the ringild as different officers, then the ringild has lost the main function of his office as depicted in the Welsh Laws. In the Flintshire Ministers' Accounts the ringild has disappeared altogether by the end of the thirteenth century. In the Ministers' Accounts for Denbigh he exists as a rather important person keeping the finances of the court and the commote, and accounting for the fees of their officials. The various rents and customary dues he presented in compoto Ringildi. In fact in Denbigh the whole monetary issue of the commote appears to have rested eventually in the ringild's hands for payment into the treasury. The account which he presented at the end of the financial year included herbage rents, tunk, recognitions of nativi, pastus Principis from freemen and pastus familiae Principis from nativi, ardreth, albadeth, amobyr, relief, payments of butter, proceeds of mills, and, in addition, the fees paid for their offices by the officers of the commote, the fee of the raglot, that of his own office of ringild, of the judge, of the raglot advocariae, and of the serjeant of the peace and his satellites, the pastus of the war-horse, the stallion, and the raglot's horse, and of the huntsmen and dogs with their attendant grooms.

The office of ringild was thus at all times one of trust and responsibility, and the chance for the ringild amassing wealth from fraudulent dealing towards either his lord or the tenants was great. In fact the men of Arvon claimed it as one of their special privileges that no ringild was allowed in Arvon.[1] But the contingency was foreseen and provided against in the Welsh Laws, which laid it down that all a ringild's possessions were at the lord's mercy at his death.[2] This is a liability peculiar to the ringild among the officers of the commote, and it serves to identify him with the 'beadle' of the Black Book of St. Davids whose movable goods are likewise imperilled after his death until his accounts have been settled to the lord's satisfaction.[3]

Lastly, the ringild seems at length to have become the chief officer of the commote in some districts in North Wales.[4] Some areas are governed by raglots and are called raglotries, and others by ringilds and are called ringildries, and it is interesting to find that while raglotries were commotes occupied by unfree tenants, ringildries were always inhabited by freemen,[5] so that the dictum of the Welsh Laws, that maers can never be over freemen, is strikingly exemplified.[6] The ringild filled the same position as the neighbouring raglot and probably had similar perquisites; and many of them were no doubt very powerful persons, as powerful as the canghellor, their former master, had been. It was one of the Earl of Derby's ringilds in Moldsdale who boasted in a drunken outburst that he was the 'heir' of the land he administered.[7]

There is little to be said of the officer called the Serjeant of the peace. He was an importation from the English system, and his title speaks for itself. In the Welsh Laws the preservation of peace seems to have rested upon a system of information and compurgation, with a fine as punishment. Incorrigible thieves or those who could not be answered for by their clansmen appear to have been sold as slaves, the purchase money going to the king or lord. By what means felons were arrested and imprisoned is not clear. But it seems certain that the canghellor had no powers of criminal jurisdiction or even of imprisonment, since he is expressly prohibited from taking any share in the proceeds of the sale of thieves. Only the land-maer has a perquisite from the capture of thieves. He has sixty pence from every prisoner entering the king's prison, which seems to show that prisoners were kept somewhere on the lord's demesne-land and under the land-maer's surveillance until they were brought to justice. But the English system of having regular officers of justice appointed to pursue and detain felons spread everywhere in Wales. The most interesting instance is found in North Wales, where the officer has assumed the Welsh name of cais. We find in certain fragmentary records of the English settlement of North Wales[1] a precise interpretation of the name. It is there stated that according to the ancient Welsh Law there were men to preserve the peace in every commote in North Wales, and that they were called 'Keys'.[2] We are told that these officials had a cylch,[3] and that the whole district was obliged to contribute to their upkeep. Their duties are described as guarding the patria, and being responsible for the persons and acts of evildoers.[4] The upkeep of these officers was regarded as a grave burden by the inhabitants of North Wales, who petitioned the king; and on the understanding that the community should answer for all felons and their deeds, the office of cais was abolished.

[3] Black Book of St. Davids, p. 276. This 'beadle' was also the officer who summoned tenants to court, and his summons, like that of the ringild, could not be denied. But the penalty noted above seems to have become common to all officers in certain districts.

There are one or two points of difficulty connected with these cais. In the first place, the records quoted assert that the office rested upon the old Welsh Law. In the codes at our disposal the office is not once mentioned, and an official specially told off to deal with the preservation of the peace is not so much as hinted at. Secondly, assuming for the moment that the authors of 'Ancient Tenures of Land' are correct, and that the cais is only the canghellor under another name, it is nevertheless surprising that all the inhabitants of North Wales are called upon to contribute to his maintenance, for the Laws are very definite in laying down the rule that the canghellor cannot have his cylch at the expense of the freemen of the commote, a stipulation which we have seen was rigidly adhered to in the case of the raglot, the descendant of the maer, both in North Wales and in the north-eastern Marches until very late times. This is really one more argument against the supposition that the cais was the descendant of the canghellor, and in favour of the rival theory that the cais was only a Welsh importation from England. Thirdly, the interpretation of 'North Wales' as mentioned in the records referred to above where they treat of the office of cais must be made in its narrowest sense as implying only those regions placed by Edward I under the Justice of Snowdon. Hence we find no payment for cylch cais appearing in the Record of Carnarvon. It is paid, however, in the fourteenth century in those parts of Flintshire which were formerly a part of the Perveddwlad. There it is called porthyant cais, glossed potura seriantis pacis, paid at Easter and Michaelmas by each of the three commotes of Englefield; so that whatever happened in 'North Wales', the serjeant of the peace was still a bailiff performing his duties of arresting criminals in Flintshire under the royal administration. In other lordships-marcher the office seems to have fallen gradually into abeyance, but the payment exacted for his cylch was continued in Yale and Bromfield until the first decade of the sixteenth century.

In South Wales the cais is represented by the bailiff, or sometimes more precisely the constable. According to the Black Book of St. Davids, the duty of keeping prisoners and escorting them to trial and execution, even the hanging of them to the sound of the horn, is a service due from tenants.[1] In one locality the inhabitants are subjected to a sort of cylch cais, for they are obliged to find 'assistants' to deal with 'robbers and depredators', and to furnish them with 'eating and drinking'.[2] In Cardiganshire, the constable or the catchpole usually is responsible for maintaining order. He sometimes keeps his prisoners at his own risk, so that no responsibility falls upon the tenants ;[1] but he has a fee for his office, and shares with the beadle (the descendant in South Wales of the ringild) in certain specified articles of the goods of felons.[2]

THE UNFREE POPULATION

SIDE by side with the free tenants, and grouped like them as a rule in weles, lecta, and gavells, the Denbigh Extent records a considerable population of unfree Celtic landholders and householders. Broken and scattered by the shock of the English conquest, their ancient tribal organization, of the time of the princes, can still be discerned beneath the escheats and forfeitures, the exchanges and new settlements of the fourteenth century.

The unfree peasant of the Denbigh Honour called himself taeog or aillt, but to the Anglo-Norman lawyer he seemed to be a nativus, born into the servile state, or a custumarius, bound by immemorial custom to perform certain services, or to render certain dues. The terms villanus and colonus, which are found in the Anglesey documents[3] and in the Black Book of St. Davids,[4] do not occur in the Denbigh Extent. Stress seems to be laid, in this pastoral district, on the element of birth, on hereditary bondage, rather than on the praedial servitude which is emphasized by the word villanus, the man of the vill, the agricultural labourer on whose work in the fields the village economy depended.[5] Though this may be merely a matter of local usage, it marks a distinction between status and tenure, which is borne out by the constant recurrence of the phrases in tenura liberorum, in tenura nativorum. Yet even the Anglo-Norman lawyers felt that the Welsh peasantry were not quite on a par with their English prototypes, for they, like the free landholders, could be called priodarii, priodorion, or proprietors, a term which, as its direct latinization implies, had no exact equivalent in Norman law. Thus the unfree proprietors in the

Denbigh Honour are described as priodarii nativi, as contrasted with the priodarii liberi, or free tribal proprietors.[1]

The Denbigh Extent shows, indeed, that the points of difference between the social and economic conditions in Wales and in England are more striking than the points of agreement. The social strata lie, so to speak, parallel with one another. Free and unfree villages are juxtaposed. There are free and unfree weles and gavells, but the pyramidal structure of the English manorial economy is lacking. In England the lord is at the top, supported by free tenants and villeins, while the free tenants are, in turn, supported by their unfree dependants. In North Wales there is co-ordination rather than subordination. The chieftain rests, as it were, on a broad basis of free tribes men and unfree non-tribesmen, all alike rendering tribute in kind or money. The taeogs and aillts may be compared with the wealas in the Anglo-Saxon laws, or with the perioeci of the Spartan city-state, both alike subject populations of alien race, depressed rather than rightless, dependent but not wholly servile, with whom freedom was a relative term and unfreedom was personal rather than tenurial. The numbers and local distribution of the unfree in the five commotes of the Denbigh honour are not without significance. Tabulated by vills, they give the following results :

Commote.	Free Vills.	Unfree Vills.	Mixed Vills.	Total.
Kaymergh	3 [2]	6 [3]	3	12
Yssalet	3	1	11	15
Ughalet	15	3	3	21
Ysdulas	6	1	5	12 [4]
Ughdulas	10	3	3	16
Totals.	37	14	25	76

It thus appears that unfreedom was most widely prevalent in the commote of Kaymergh, where English influence was strong, while in Ughalet, where the boundary marched with Carnarvonshire, and in Ughdulas, free vills were largely in the majority. Of the 'mixed' vills, which included both free and unfree weles or lecta and gavells, the proportion of free to unfree was about equal in Kaymergh and in Ughalet, while in Yssalet, Ysdulas, and Ughdulas the unfree were in excess.

It is probably in these 'mixed' vills that the clue to the nature and meaning of Welsh unfreedom may be sought, for here kindreds and individuals may be seen rising and falling in status, achieving freedom or submitting to servitude. Not only could free and unfree weles and gavells be locally contiguous in the same vill, there could be freedom and unfreedom within the limits of a single kindred-group. There were weles which were described as neither 'pure free' nor 'pure unfree'; [1] the descendants of the same ancestor could be, some free and some unfree, grouped, some in weles of liberi, others in weles of nativi, and an individual could even combine freedom and unfreedom in his own person, and be accounted half-free. Thus in the commote of Yssalet, where eleven out of fifteen vills were 'mixed', the vill of Boydveskan with its hamlet of Messekay [2] was divided as follows: one-third of Boydveskan with all Messekay was free, and equalled one gavell, of which, in 1334, half was escheat, and half was 'the half gavell of Kendalo ap Cathaern' held by two householders—Ior' Duy ap Ieuan ap Wyn and Ieuan ap David ap Mad'. These were free. The remaining two-thirds were held in two lecta of nativi—Wele Kewrek' ap Cathaern and Wele Cadugan ap Cathaern. Three-quarters of the wele of Kewrek' were escheat. One-quarter was held by two nativi, brothers, Ken' and Madok ap Gron' ap Eignon, whose services were like those of the nativi of the 'mixed' but largely unfree vill of Lewenny, in the same commote. The wele of Cadugan had fallen to the lord for default of relief, amobyr, and other dues and services, because the ultimus heres, Ieuan ap Grono ap Ior', depatriavit and resigned his land into the lord's hand, since he could not pay arrears of service. It was now rented in grosso, and called 'Graghernel', and contained the third part of the vill of Boydveskan. Here either two-thirds of a kindred-group have sunk in the social scale or one-third has risen, but all the land is held in treweloghe, by weles or lecta. The villata of Moghedreue,[3] also, in the commote of Ughdulas, included three progenies of free tenants and one progenies or lectum which was said to be neither purely free nor purely servile, non pure libera nec pure nativa. These four kindred-groups held two-thirds of the vill, and the remaining third was divided into three lecta, in tenura nativorum. Similarly, in the villata of Coloyne in the same commote there were three lecta or weles, two of nativi, and one, Wele Cradok ap Gethlok, neither 'merely free nor merely servile'.[1]

These instances serve to illustrate the great intermixture of free and unfree elements in the Denbigh population, but they do not throw much light on the difficult questions of what constituted freedom, or of how it was determined, won, and lost. Was it a matter of tribal birth and rights, of tenure, or of services? Could it be acquired by purchase, merit, or favour? What was the exact line of division between the free man and the nativus, and what led the Anglo-Norman lawyer of the fourteenth century to write down some weles of the Denbigh Honour as free, others as servile, and others, again, as neither free nor unfree, when the tenants of all alike held by the same kind of tenure and did much the same services? Mr. Seebohm explains Welsh freedom and unfreedom as a question of rights depending on the recognition of kindred.[2] Consequently there are degrees of freedom determined by the number of rights recognized, and by the strength of the tie of kindred, and the resulting strength of compurgators' oaths and tribal privileges. The full tribesman is the free priodor, the innate boneddig, separated from the non-tribesman or stranger in blood by a deep gulf, which in North Wales was practically impassable. The non-tribesmen, again, are classified under four headings, in ascending order: (1) Slaves, who could be bought and sold (caeth). (2) Taeogs and aillts, or permanent nativi, born non-tribesmen, without recognized family rights, holding land, as a rule, in trefgevery. (3) Non-tribesmen, alltuds or strangers, growing or having grown in four generations into weles of non-tribesmen, with recognized family rights, proprietors, but on terra nativa, and tied to the land, as adscripti glebae. (4)

Strangers or alltuds of exceptional position, who, having married into the tribe, had become tribesmen in the fourth generation by repeated intermarriage. These favoured strangers, however, seem to have been confined to South Wales.

In the Denbigh Extent the first class does not appear to be represented at all, though the word kaythe or caeth (gavella Caythe) occurs, and is explained as the Welsh equivalent of the Latin villica—gavella villica, the 'villein gavell', as opposed to gavella Rethe, the 'free gavell', or gavella libera.[1] Since the second class, also, is only represented by a few insignificant survivals, the bulk of the unfree population in the North Welsh district of Denbigh must fall into the third class of thriving alltuds, or strangers. This seems to agree with the fact that they are called priodarii, or priodarii nativi, in the Extent, for according to the Venedotian Code,[2] alltuds settled continuously on the land of the king or an uchelwr for four generations became priodorion, proprietors on terra nativa. Mr. Seebohm apparently assigns all the North Welsh non-tribesmen living in weles, and holding land in treweloghe, to this class of alltuds,[3] but it may be doubted if there would be enough 'kin-shattered persons' and immigrants of non-Celtic blood in Denbigh to account for all the weles of non-tribesmen. It may be suggested that local custom had something to do with the prevalence of treweloghe tenure among the taeogs or nativi of North Wales, as contrasted with the trefgevery of the southern counties of the Principality, and that if some of the Denbigh nativi and custumarii were favoured alltuds, others were favoured aillts, remnants of an earlier race, conquered by the Welsh.

In South Wales the method of land-holding might be used as a means of determining servile status, since the normal system of tenure for aillts and taeogs seems to have been trefgevery. In the Denbigh Extent, however, they are represented as holding, in by far the greater number of cases, in treweloghe. Mr. Seebohm notes that weles of nativi, which occur occasionally in the Record of Carnarvon and other Extents, are 'very general' in Denbigh.[1] It would be no exaggeration to go further, and to say that in Denbigh they are almost universal. Yet survivals of trefgevery may be traced, clearly in the commotes of Ysdulas and Ughdulas, less distinctly in the commote of Kaymergh. In the commote of Ysdulas there was a certain hamella de Mayrdreue,[2] belonging to the manor of Dynorbyn Vaur, which, in the time of the princes, was entirely in the hands of nativi or custumarii, who owed certain customary services to the manor, which, under the lordship of the Earl of Lincoln, had been commuted for money payments. But these payments were still made adinvicem, and the custumarii continued to hold the greater part of the hamlet inter se hereditarie. In the commote of Ughdulas six nativi held the unfree vill of Kylkenneys[3] adinvicem, owing butter-money in common, holding a mill at an annual rent in common, and paying individually certain sums which represented commuted reaping and building services. The butter-money was regarded as a communal responsibility: 'they say that if there were but one of them left, he alone would hold the whole vill, and pay all the butter-money, but he would only be liable for reaping service and for house-building, as a single tenant.' A similar entry in the Record of Carnarvon[4] refers to the hamlet of Mairdref in the Anglesey manor of Aberffraw, and Mr. Seebohm sees in this 'joint liability' trefgevery tenure, connected with 'villein tenancy'.[5] We may then, in all probability, regard the vill of Kylkenneys as the maertrev of the commote of Ughdulas, for we learn from the Venedotian Code[6] that the brenhin or lord was entitled to two trevs in every commote, one for his maertrev, and the other for his waste and summer pasture. It is in connexion with the manor of Astret Oweyn that a few faint traces may be found of what may have been a maertrev with trefgevery tenure in the commote of Kaymergh. The villata of Astret Oweyn[7] was always in demesne, in one manor, except for certain cottages with crofts which were formerly in the tenure of nativi who owed various services to the prince. The Earl of Lincoln had removed these nativi, and had granted them land in exchange in other places, turning them into rent-paying tenants with separate holdings, but it is not improbable that in so doing he was breaking up the last remnants of unfree trefgevery holding on the maertrev of the ancient lords of Kaymergh.

If the tests of status and tenure leave the distinction between the Denbigh free man and the nativus still uncertain, the test of services gives somewhat more definite results. The land-holding nativi were subject to escheat and forfeiture. Thus the vill of Segroyt[1] with its hamlets consisted, in the time of the princes, of twenty-two gavells and a half, in tenura nativorum, of which eleven and a half had come into the lord's hand at the English Conquest, partly by deaths contra pacem and partly by default of service; and there are many other similar cases. The goods of an intestate nativus went to his lord,[2] saving the rights of the Church and the raglot, or, according to the consuetudines at the end of the account of the commote of Kaymergh,[3] if a man, whether free or unfree, died intestate, the lord took half his goods if he were married, except the corn which went to the raglot. Again, the arrangements for the reliefs of the free and unfree, and for the lord's succession if there were no heirs within the third grade of kinship, were the same in kind for free and unfree, though the unfree paid only half the relief of the free. There could also be landless nativi, and here the condition of personal dependence is evident. Of four nativi not holding land in Segroyt,[4] each paid the lord a shilling a year at two terms, de annua recognitione quamdiu non tenent terram, and one who had left the estate was to be brought back with his chattels. Nativi could own personal property, as is abundantly shown in the Welsh Laws.[5] They had houses and cottages, and were entitled to a proportionate share in the common woods and waste, according to the payment of tunk.[6] In common with free men the nativi paid tunk, the 'tunc pound', and dues for pastus, &c., and rendered merchet and amobyr. But whereas, as a rule, the free had to provide the pastus for the prince, the unfree had to feed his 'family', and, in accordance with the Venedotian Code,[1] to maintain his dogs and horses. The nativi also had to do building and autumn works, to serve as reeves, &c.[2] Still, if certain services were more onerous than others, while amount of service was taken as a mark of servitude, the free also might have to provide 'fosterage' and to maintain dogs, and various passages in the Extent imply that the kinds and degrees of service were alike a matter of capacity and wealth rather than of birth. Thus at Lewenny, a 'mixed' vill which is one of the pattern townships to the model of which other nativi conform,[3] the distinctions of service are between those nativi holding land and those holding houses.[4] In the commote of Kaymergh, all the tenants, free and unfree, had to pay adinvicem for the lord's stallion and groom, &c., and the custom was collected from the tenants of free men, from free men without tenants and from nativi, while each free tenant of a nativus paid 1½*d.* to the pastus lucrarii, &c.[5] Similarly, in the commote of Yssalet, the services were distributed according to land-holding and house-holding.[6] Yet there is one service which seems to be exclusively reserved for the free—individual military service in the host. The ordinary taeog was a 'hatchet man', and had to provide sumpter-horses.[7] The Venedotian Code decrees that from every villein trev the king is to have a man, a horse and an axe, to form encampments at his own cost. But each free man served in person, and as he had a sword to protect his kinsmen,[8] he doubtless had also to use it in the lord's service.

This question of military service connects with the case, already mentioned,[9] of the men who were 'half-free'. Of the villata of Taldrogh it is said that in the time of the princes half of it was in the hands of the progenies Seisel ap Canon, which was neither 'pure free' nor 'pure unfree', while the other half was in the hands of 'pure nativi'. With this phrase may be compared a passage in the English Hundred Rolls,[1] where an Oxfordshire nativus is described as holding a virgate in 'pure villeinage', paying a rent of 2*s.* 2*d.*, working all the year round, and paying tallage, and redeeming his children at the lord's will. The 'half-free' nativi of Taldrogh, who were members of a progenies, paid tunk, inter se, and each individually paid butter-money and something for the upkeep of houses in Denbigh, while for the pastus of horse and groom and dogs, and 'fosterage', they paid 'like the other liberi seu nativi' of the commote. Their further services were pastus of the forester and of the satellites pacis 'like others of the commote', with suit of court, and 'they follow the prince in the host, like the other free men of the commote'. Is it not by virtue of this personal military service, possibly in addition to suit of court, that the Taldrogh nativi are said to be partly free? Again a passage from the Oxfordshire Hundred Rolls may be compared with the Welsh records. In the thirteenth century unfree English tenants could complain that their ancestors had been 'free like socmen', and 'did the king service for forty days at their own cost, with pourpoint, lance, and steel cap'.[2] This suggestion is borne out by the description in the Denbigh Extent of the 'mixed' villata of Meynyot, in the commote of Ysdulas.[3] At Meynyot there were three lecta, of which two and eight-ninths of the third, Wele Hyrodel, were unfree. The remaining ninth of the third lectum was free, ex dono Principis; two-thirds of it were held, in 1334, libere, by two brothers, Grono Vaghan ap Grono ap Ior' and Madok ap Grono ap Ior'. They paid tunk, and did no other service except following the prince in the host and attending the lord's court of the commote when summoned. The nativi of the same wele owed butter-money, oats, hens, &c., and did autumn works, and collected their pence inter se, according to the amount of their chattels. Here, then, the status of a free man is marked by exemption from all dues save military service and suit of court, and this status is definitely acquired by the favour of the prince, the ancient Welsh chief. With this may be compared a passage from the account of the free villata of Loydcoyd with its hamlets, in the commote of Ughdulas, where the prince had granted to Ken', son of Ior' ap Gougon, and his heirs, the whole wele or progenies of Ior' ap Gougon hereditarily, with all his other lands in Wales, quit of all tunk and treth, and of all relief or amobyr, and of all other services except those written in the record of Tuennan.[1] At Tuennan, a neighbouring free vill, the free tenants were exempted from tunk and treth and all services save attending the lord's court when summoned, and following the lord in the host, &c.[2] Evidently such an exemption was regarded as the sign of a high degree of freedom, a royal boon which even a free tribesman would be eager to obtain. The enfranchised fraction of a wele at Meynyot was not quite so free as this, for it was still burdened with the payment of tunk, but it was much more free than the remainder of the wele, which had still to render base services, or their money equivalent. That personal military service and suit of court were regarded as peculiarly free and honourable obligations may be gathered from the other passages in the Denbigh Extent which refer to such services. In the commote of Ughalet the only case in which personal military service is explicitly mentioned is the free vill of Guythheryn,[3] but in the list of customs due from the whole commote, Ughalet is equated with Yssalet in regard to suit of court, military service, intestacy, and hereditary succession,[4] and in Yssalet the only recorded instance of the rendering of personal military service and suit of court is that of the half-free men of Taldrogh. In the commote of Ysdulas occur the cases of Meynyot, of Kylkydok—a 'mixed' vill where the one free lectum alone rendered military service—of the 'mixed' vill of Dynorbyn Vaghan where personal military service in time of war was due from free men alone, and of the free vills of Brenfannyk and of Toronoth.[5] At Brenfannyk the holders of half the wele or progenies of Ken' ap Ior', of which half had escheated, said that they paid no tunk nor treth, nor did any other service except following the prince in the host, &c., 'like others of the Wyrion Eden'. The half-wele of Wyrion Barthe paid tunk and followed the lord in the host for all service, because their holdings had been

[1] Rot. Hund., ii. 822 b. [2] Ibid., ii. 748–9. [3] ff. 208 et seq.

'tyrkennyf' from the time of the princes.[1] At Toronoth the progenies Ken' ap Ior' ap Goug' held half the wele Ior' ap Goug' except one-thirtieth, which had escheated; their services were the same as those of Brenfannyk and Abergele, in the same district. Under Abergele they are entered again as the progenies Ken' ap Ior' ap Goug' ap Idenerth, who owed no tunk nor treth nor relief nor amobyr, nor other service, save following the prince in the host. Finally, in the commote of Ughdulas, in the free vill of Laethenayn, the wele of Ior' ap Gougon held by the progenies Ken' ap Ior' is exempted from all service save attendance on the lord in the host, and the free tenants of Tuennan are only called on to do suit of court and to serve in the army.[2]

From all this evidence it may be concluded that in Denbigh in the time of the princes, freedom, measured by service, was a relative term, depending on fine shades and gradations of obligation, which melt almost insensibly into one another, and easily elude observation. The Welsh tribesman who owed military service alone, or military service with suit of court, was accounted more free than he who was bound by many and various dues and services of a less honourable nature.[3] Personal military service, indeed, was apparently in Denbigh the special privilege of the free or half-free priodor, though in Carnarvon it seems to have been also incumbent on villeins (villani).[4]

Measured by tenure, again, there was little difference between freedom and unfreedom in Denbigh, for treweloghe tenure was almost universal. But measured by birth and kinship there could be no hesitation in drawing the line between free and unfree. The free man was the tribesman of Celtic blood and kindred; the unfree taeog, aillt, or alltud, was the alien, the non-tribesman, who might acquire a kindred and hold in treweloghe, but between whom and the Celtic free man there yawned a great gulf. There were, however, 'bridges across the gulf,'[5] fewer, it is true, in North Wales than in the south, but even in North Wales freedom could be conferred as a royal boon, ex dono Principis, and court officials could win enfranchisement by reason of their office.[1] The ranks of the unfree, on the other hand, would be constantly recruited by misfortune and debt, by war and crime. Economic and political causes were at work, depressing free tribesmen into servitude, driving strangers into North Wales to swell the settlements of alltuds, moulding and shifting the social conditions of the old pre-Celtic population.

The English conquest of the thirteenth century would tend to accentuate and stereotype these fluctuations, while it introduced new elements of social change and confusion. Nice distinctions of blood and race between the Denbigh alltuds and aillts or taeogs were lost. The Anglo-Norman lawyer swept all alike into the one great class of nativi or custumarii, much as his eleventh-century predecessor merged the social differences of the Anglo-Saxon peasantry in the comprehensive term villani, when he summarized the returns of the Domesday Survey for the foreign conqueror. Yet the ancient tribal customs were as tenacious in Anglicized Wales as in Normanized England. If the rural life of Anglo-Saxon days can be to a great extent reconstructed from Domesday Book and other post-Conquest documents, the fragments of the older Welsh social order also remained embedded in the new feudal society, and may be pieced together into a coherent whole from the fourteenth-century Denbigh Extent and its companion records of 'the time of the princes'.

ENGLISH TENURIAL ARRANGEMENTS

Some words have now to be said on the subject of English tenurial arrangements within the Honour of Denbigh, as evidenced by the Survey. We do not find—it would be a mistake to expect to find—traces of any attempt to introduce English manorial organization into North Wales on any general scale, or to apply English land law according to rigid feudal rules.

[1] Seebohm, op. cit., pp. 125–6. Cf. Ancient Laws, i. 444: 'Three ways in which a taeog may be emancipated: (1) when a church is consecrated in a taeog-tref by permission of the king; (2) when the king confers one of twenty-four offices of a privileged court on a taeog; (3) by the tonsure of a clerk.'

It seems tolerably certain that the compulsory introduction of feudal tenures into South Wales in the past had proved a failure, and, after the conquest of North Wales, the English officials must have been alive to the necessity of compromise between English ideas and Welsh arrangements, and of adapting their land policy as far as possible to the conditions which they found. One important consideration, which has to be taken into account at the outset, is that by the fourteenth century finance had become the all-important factor governing tenurial arrangements, and the organization of an English manor in a district such as North Wales was a most unprofitable venture; the hilly land was itself unsuitable for agricultural improvement, the scattered population could not easily be exploited for labour, and the disturbed state of the country was a continual danger to the stability of estates. Apart from these particular circumstances, however, the general history of early land-systems, whether in England or elsewhere, teaches one to look for continuity of development, for the gradual blending of contrary systems owing to economic causes, rather than for sudden, conscious, artificial changes as the result of political circumstances. It would therefore be a mistake to expect the Denbigh Extent to furnish more than a very few obvious examples of English tenures. What have to be looked for, rather, are marks, more or less definite, of the adaptation of English and Welsh arrangements at such points of contact between the two systems as would present themselves. Such an adaptation would not be so difficult when it is remembered that the Welsh tribal system not only possessed certain original features of a quasi-feudal pattern, but also had long been undergoing changes approximating more and more to the conditions of land-tenure across the Border.

Thus from the earliest times there must have been a slight gradation of tribal society due to the interposition of lords of commotes with their subordinate officials between the Prince of North Wales and the tribesmen, and the tendency would be for such intermediaries to divert, and perhaps appropriate, to themselves some of those quasi-feudal services which the tribesmen and nativi properly owed to the sovereign prince. The question arises whether these gradations of tribal society were beginning to extend to the tenure of land by the time of the Denbigh record, but the text furnishes no certain evidence in answer. Among the common customs described at the end of the commotes, passages repeatedly occur which speak very distinctly of gradations of land tenure; such expressions as liber tenens qui habet sub se tenentes, and quilibet liber tenens nativorum si forte nativi habeant tenentes, or again, omnes liberi et nativi cum eorum tenentibus, seem definite enough if literally taken.[1] Yet it would be a mistake to interpret them in any feudal sense. These 'tenants' of tribesmen and nativi are probably casual settlers or squatters on tribal land rather than permanent landed dependants, and they may be compared with those 'undersettles' who appear occasionally in English manorial records of the period.[2] Other expressions in the text seem much more significant, but are difficult to explain. It is said of certain pastus dues in the commote of Kaymergh, that they are to be collected not only from the free and the nativi, but also from 'the tenants of the bishop', tenentibus Episcopi.[3] The statement is repeated in a similar connexion among the customs of Yssalet: every priodor is to render the dues in question, 'the bishop's men as well as the others,' et tam homines Episcopi quam alii.[4] These allusions may, of course, refer to tenurial arrangements made after the English conquest, in which case they need call for no special remark; but the details given in the description of the vill of Guythheryn in Ughalet clearly date from the time of the princes: the holders of the wele Thlegat Vryght hold in mesne of the lord (of Denbigh) and their (immediate) lord is called their abbot; and certain of the holders in the other two weles, Wele Eignon' Mynkenenwith and Wele Gweythhoyth, were tenants of certain abbots belonging to the progeny of Canon ap Lauwargh, who died against the peace.[5] The text goes on to record the services of the component gavells, but it tells us nothing of the identity of the 'abbots' or of the nature of their lordship. We can but remark the ecclesiastical significance of these cases, and we must be content with the conjecture that the Church of tribal Wales, while it does not appear to have succeeded in making its organization independent of the tribal formation of society, may sometimes have intervened as a tenurial group between the tribesmen and their prince, or, at least, may have secured for its hierarchy, both episcopal and monastic, some sort of immunity from the prince's jurisdiction.

Another factor which was effecting changes in tribal economy was the practice of commutation, which by the end of the thirteenth century was becoming wellnigh universal.[1] The process cannot but have stimulated the growth of the idea of tenure, practically unknown to early Welsh law, and the consequent diminution of the importance of status would weaken the very foundation of tribal society. It is true that status is still the all-important consideration in the condition of things recorded in the Denbigh Survey, but the financial factor must be set against it—the exact appraisement of the cash value of ancient services, the apportioning of the sums among the co-owners, and the apparent conversion of the latter into the position of tenants rendering rent; these are changes which in course of time will effect quite as much as any drastic and sudden application of English law.

It may be suggested, however, that the growth of commutation, regarded from the English point of view, would have another quite different effect: it would preclude the possibility of the cultivation of demesne by labour-services and week-work, and therefore prevent the growth of typical English manors within the newly-subjugated areas of North Wales. It would be natural to conclude that those areas never passed through any stage corresponding to the early manorial period of England, but that the tribal arrangements were slowly modified until they approximated to the conditions of English land tenure of the later Middle Ages.

Leaving now these larger questions, we may recall a few instances in the Survey of the development of new conditions on tribal land—conditions which, though not the outcome of the political changes, will nevertheless help forward the gradual anglicization of tribal arrangements. Thus the numerous cases, especially in the commote of Yssalet, where the co-parceners in gavells are written down as householders can only be interpreted as marking the spontaneous growth of private ownership.[1] If as yet these individual rights apply only to houses or stock or chattels, in course of time the extension of the principle can hardly fail to lead to the partition of tribal holdings and to the individual proprietorship of land.

In this connexion, another modification of tribal arrangements becomes especially significant, namely, the permanent partition and localization of the tunk payment. This subject has already been discussed in its proper place. It is enough here to note that whatever may have been the unit of assessment for the tunk-pound, the original uniformity of its distribution had begun to be broken up by relaxations and exemptions of one kind and another long before the close of the thirteenth century; and so, by extending this break-up, the operation of the escheats after the conquest only carried further that process of partition and localization which eventually transformed the tunk payment into something very like rent for land, or, at least, an incident of rent-paying tenure.

The general decline of the importance of tribal status has also been referred to before and illustrated, but one or two of the examples furnished by the Survey may conveniently be recalled, such as the case of the gavella Rethe at Denbigh,[2] where nativi are found holding, it may be said, as freemen; or again, the case of the weles of Kewrek' ap Cathaern and Cadugan ap Cathaern at Boydveskan,[3] where, much more remarkably, free tribesmen are found holding as nativi.[4] The parallel between nativitas and the English villenagium immediately suggests itself, though no doubt it must not be pressed very far. Yet it can hardly be wrong to infer from these and the many parallel cases in the Survey that a time was approaching in tribal Wales of the fourteenth century, when the conditions of nativitas or tribal bondage would pass altogether from persons and attach to the tenure of land.

Before leaving this part of the subject one point more demands attention. The Extent of the Honour of Denbigh is made by villatae. The contemporary survey (1326) of the lands by the Bishop of St. Davids is made by manors, or at any rate by units which are called maneria, and its details are recorded more or less in manorial terms and forms. The St. Davids Survey is usually, and no doubt rightly, regarded as a striking illustration of the changes which two centuries of Norman lordship and feudal law had been effecting, not altogether successfully it is true, in the economic arrangements of South Wales. But the fact that the Edwardian surveyors of the Honour of Denbigh did not have to resort to any artificial method of plotting out the land, but were able to retain the old tribal settlement-unit as the basis of their survey, seems to be much more striking; for it points to the spontaneous growth upon tribal land of village communities approximating to the English type. In other words, it shows that the tribal villata was ceasing to be merely a geographical area in which the kin-groups had rights of husbandry and grazing, and was becoming a permanent inhabited settlement, the home of groups of tribesmen and nativi who were drawing more and more into an organized community with an individuality of its own. These communities exercise active rights in a corporate capacity and the overlord sometimes enters into agreements with them.[1] The communitas villatae is therefore found in the Extent farming plots, taking over parts of pasture, renting mills, and even holding weles which had come into the hand of the lord. The villata was thus the natural unit for the surveyors to adopt for their inquiry. If necessary they could use the communitas villatae for the purpose of obtaining information. It is likely, indeed, that the extentor or escheator was made to listen often enough to joint representations or claims put forward by the villata for reference to the lord. There was therefore little necessity for the application of any fictitious manorial organization. Machinery which was readily adaptable to the conduct of an Extent after the English fashion was already there under the hand of the surveyor.

Once we begin to look more deeply into the text of the Survey, it is not difficult to multiply instances of these changes which were slowly spreading over the ancient society. It is necessary, however, to insist on the distinction between this process of natural change within the tribal structure and the deliberate innovations effected from without by the English lords and their bailiffs; for otherwise the true significance of the Edwardian conquest will be overlooked. That conquest did not revolutionize the rural economy of North Wales: it accelerated a process which, having already been in operation, would of itself have completed a transformation of the social conditions of the country.

Turning now to consider the actual application of English arrangements after the subjugation of North Wales, it will be found that the changes introduced, while undoubtedly far-reaching, did not alter the face of the land as much as might be supposed. That there was some shifting of kindreds is certainly true, but the creation of new estates was very rare, and, generally, there was no very drastic rearrangement of land-divisions, for the unit of tribal settlement, the villata, was readily adaptable to the new tenurial system.

The immediate result of the subjugation of the country was the application on a very general scale of the law of escheat, whereby a great quantity of land, or rather of rights over land, came directly into the hands of the new English overlords. It is not altogether clear, however, whether this process of appropriation by the new lords was properly escheat for default of services or lack of tenants, in which case there was no innovation but only the application of tribal law, or whether it was the more ruthless feudal law of conquest, namely, forfeiture for rebellion. The Denbigh Survey, having been compiled several decades after the Edwardian settlement, can hardly be expected to furnish detailed information as to what took place in 1283. It speaks generally of rights, or fractional parts of gavells, which had escheated to the lord partim ratione tenentium mortuorum contra pacem, partim pro defectu servitiorum. The expression seems to imply a contrast between land which had escheated to the lord in the usual way for failure of services, and land which had been forfeited to the lord by the heirs of Welshmen who had taken active part in the wars. On the other hand, escaeta ratione mortis contra pacem may only mean that the wars had so depopulated the country that the survivors of many kindreds had been unable to continue the services due from their holdings, which accordingly escheated according to the tribal and the feudal rule; in which case such contrast as is implied would be between original escheat at the conquest and occasional escheat during the succeeding years. It is at least significant that the word forisfactura is very rarely used in the text of the Survey.

Whatever may have been the exact process, there thus came to the Lord of Denbigh a great accumulation of fractional shares in and rights over land in almost every one of the vills comprising the new Honour. These shares had to be translated into acres,[1] and accordingly there followed the second great result of the conquest, namely, a survey and measurement of the whole of the conquered area. This process undoubtedly brought about a fundamental change, for, in spite of the survival of the kin-groups and the long persistence of many of the earlier social customs, the measuring of the land marked the beginning of a transition from a tribal economy in which the use of land merely flowed from the possession of tribal rights, to a land-owning system in which position, services, and privileges were gauged by the possession of acres. It may be conjectured that, just because of the survival of kindreds and customs, such a survey could not be made once for all, but would require periodic renewal as the structure of the groups changed and shares fell in and services defaulted to the lord. This need for renewal, indeed, may be the raison d'être of the Extent of Denbigh in 1334; in any case, the need for that Extent and the nature of it point to the comparative leniency of the English economic policy in North Wales. Fifty years after the settlement, we find the English surveyors still recording very ancient payments, still struggling with infinitesimal fractions of the gavell.

It will be seen from the text of the Extent that the surveyors first of all stated in terms of acres the area of each vill; next, the shares therein of the various progenies were recorded; and finally, the total propars domini was ascertained in acres by adding together the shares or fractions of shares in the vill which had escheated, either at the time of the conquest or for any subsequent default of service or tenure. The figures given enable a rough estimate to be formed of the proportion of escheat to the total vill-area in each of the commotes of Kaymergh, Yssalet, Ughalet, and Ysdulas, but in the commote of Ughdulas the acreage of the vills is not recorded, and only the sum of the escheat can be very roughly ascertained. Thus in Kaymergh some 4,700 acres were escheat out of a total vill-area of 9,200, in Ysdulas 4,900 acres were escheat out of 13,000 acres, in Ughalet 5,800 acres out of 15,800 acres,[1] and in Yssalet (where the figures are incomplete) about 14,000 out of 30,000 acres. Finally, of Ughdulas it is only possible to say that the escheat amounted to at least 3,300 acres, and may have reached a much higher figure. For the non-escheated areas still held by liberi and nativi, the English lord stepped into the place of the tribal Prince of North Wales, taking over all the old renders and services, which although, no doubt, very largely commuted already, were now registered and re-valued with the utmost precision. The land which had escheated was similarly valued, and where necessary 'approved' in order to get the best possible return. It is this process of appruvamentum and the general agricultural development of the land which must have proved in the long run the most important result of the subjugation of the country.

The new lord could deal with the escheat in two ways: he could either create therefrom new private estates, maneria; or he could re-grant the land in acres to English settlers or to Welshmen on the conditions of one or other of various English tenures. But first he negotiated considerable exchanges of territory with the tribesmen in order to render the areas of escheat more compact, or to obtain land more favourably situated for agricultural purposes, and also, no doubt, to simplify the complexities of the finances of the estate. These exchanges, excambia, are repeatedly mentioned in the text of the Survey, though it is not always easy to follow the course of the transactions. It is clear, however, that the lord's aim was, where possible, to get the acreage of entire vills into his hands; and of this the best examples occur at Skeybeon, Lewenny, and Beryn on the borders of the commotes of Kaymergh and Yssalet, and at Astret Canon and Denbigh at the heart of the Honour. There seems to have been much scattering of the shares of kindreds in the course of the process, no doubt in order to fill up gaps left in different vills by isolated cases of escheat. As a rule, however, the transfer of the shares of a group (which did not of necessity occasion the transplanting of the group itself) did not go far, if at all, outside the boundaries of the original commote. One signal exception is the case of the sons of David ap Griffith, whose half-share of Skeybeon was taken by the lord in exchange for allocations in the remote vills of Mathebrut and Escorebrithl in Ughdulas.[1] Other noticeable cases are transferences of holdings from Lewenny [2] to Barrok and Guythheryn, and from Beryn [3] to Prees.

It has already been suggested that the creation of new estates on the model of the English manor was not part of the policy of the new lord of Denbigh. The newly-formed Honour was an estate composed primarily of rent-paying vills, and although the Survey describes four territorial centres or units, each of which is styled a manerium, it is difficult to detect in its description of them, as they existed in 1334, the essential features of a manor of the English pattern. These 'manors' are situated respectively at Astret Oweyn and Kilforn in the commote of Kaymergh, at Denbigh in Yssalet, and at Dynorbyn Vaur in Ysdulas. Of these, the 'manors' of Kilforn and Denbigh, which were of recent creation, are to be distinguished from the 'manors' of Astret and Dynorbyn, which the surveyors are careful to describe as having belonged to the demesne of the princes of North Wales.[4] Enough has already been said, both in this Introduction and elsewhere, to explain the nature of this 'ancient demesne' of the princes, which seems to have comprised a residence or home-farm called in the extents a 'manor', with a maertrev or appurtenant hamlet of nativi holding in trefgevery tenure and owing customary labour-services on the demesne. Such appears to have been the 'manor' and maertrev at Aberffraw described by Mr. Seebohm [5] from the evidence of the Anglesey Extents, and a parallel though less fully-developed example is to be found in the present Survey at Dynorbyn

Vaur, while at Astret Oweyn the 'manor' has survived, but only doubtful traces of the maertrev remain.

Now it has already been pointed out that the economy of the Welsh tribe possessed certain features, either original or of natural growth, which strongly resembled some of the tenurial arrangements of English feudalism. Of such resemblances this organization of the Welsh demesne-estate in conjunction with a maertrev of custumarii seems to be a striking example; and it is to be remarked that these tribal 'manors', though doubtless a late development, were none the less the result of spontaneous growth, not of political or social change. Before comparing the four Denbigh 'manors' in detail, certain points about the two ancient estates are to be noticed. Thus, at Astret Oweyn the 'manor' appears to have been coincident with the vill; so at least the words of the text imply: villata de Astret Oweyn semper fuit in dominico videlicet in uno manerio.[1] On the other hand, we do not know in what relation, if any, the 'manor' of Dynorbyn Vaur stood to the vill of Dynorbyn Vaghan; the latter is treated separately in the Survey, and may have been quite independent of the 'manor'.[2] Again, whereas at Astret we have only a trace of a maertrev in the survival of certain holdings quorundam nativorum qui fecerunt Principi diversas servitutes,[3] at Dynorbyn Vaur the maertrev unmistakably survives in the Hamella de Mayrdreue, about which the Survey has much to say.[4] Moreover, it seems beyond doubt that additional labour-services were formerly provided on the demesne of both 'manors' by the nativi of neighbouring vills.[5] Nevertheless, these survivals of customary works were no longer of any importance, as such, at the time of the Survey; for at Dynorbyn Vaur the Earl of Lincoln had compounded with the nativi of Mayrdreue for all their consuetudines et opera ad manerium for a sum of 35*s.* 10*d.* a year,[6] while at Astret Oweyn he had removed altogether the two or three surviving nativi, giving them exchanges elsewhere;[7] the additional services, too, had been commuted to the extraneous nativi both at Astret and Dynorbyn.[8] These changes must be accounted of great significance.

As for the other two 'manors', that at Kilforn the Survey explicitly states to have been made by the Earl of Lincoln, after the conquest, out of lands in the vills of Kilforn and Astret Canon;[1] while that at Denbigh we are left to conclude was also of English creation, since the Survey, which invariably records the details of the ancient demesne of the princes, says nothing of the Denbigh 'manor' to make us suppose that it ever formed part of that demesne, or in any way belonged to the tribal period.

Let us now bring the descriptions of these four manorial centres side by side.[2] In round figures, the total yearly value of Astret is £12, of Dynorbyn £24, of Kilforn £48, and of Denbigh £6. The total acreage of Astret is 300 acres, of Dynorbyn 400 acres, of Kilforn 780 acres, and of Denbigh 90 acres. This includes in each case arable land (267, 243, 239, and 75 acres respectively), meadow (11, 22, 240, and 1½ acres), pasture (12½, 72, 248, and 11 acres), and at Dynorbyn a wood of 33 acres. At Astret, at Dynorbyn, and at Kilforn there is a small quantity of rented land which is held at will by a few English tenants in small plots for money rents. On each of the four 'manors' the capital messuage contains two granges or dwelling-houses and a cow-house, while at Astret there is also a domus pro famulis, a sheepfold and two crofts, at Dynorbyn a domus pro feno, a granary and a dovecot, at Kilforn a camera pro ballivo, a bakery and a dovecot, and at Denbigh a dovecot and two fishponds. The yearly value of the capital messuage with its appurtenances is at Astret 10*s.* 4*d.*, at Dynorbyn 11*s.* 8*d.*, at Kilforn 13*s.* 4*d.*, and at Denbigh 6*s.* 8*d.*; while the perquisita curie or fines for agrarian transgression yield the petty annual totals of 3*s.* 4*d.*, 13*s.* 4*d.*, 13*s.* 4*d.*, and 20*d.* on the respective 'manors'.

Here then, at the beginning of the fourteenth century, we have four small demesne-centres belonging to an English Honour in North Wales, which exhibit hardly any of the characteristic features of an English manor. We find on them no servile population, no customary tenure, no week-work, no evidence of any kind of the exploitation of labour for the lord's demesne. On the contrary, whereas on one, and perhaps two, of these manors a well-developed system of labour-services undoubtedly existed in tribal times, whatever survived of it had been deliberately swept away by the English lord. Furthermore, we can detect no essential difference at the time of the Survey between the two 'manors' of ancient foundation and the two which were created at the time of the Conquest. True, at Kilforn we find the improved agriculture of the three-field system; but this has also been introduced at Dynorbyn.[1] On the one, again, we find the best developed pasture; on the other, the most valuable acres of arable. Finally, on three of the manors there exist a few tenants, hardly more than a dozen in all, who are neither freeholders nor custumarii, but tenants at will for money rents—a precarious title. It will reasonably be asked whence came all the labour for these estates; who ploughed the 260 acres at Astret, the 240 acres at Kilforn; and again, how was the money-value of the manors realized? It is hard to find an answer from the evidence of the Survey.

[1] ff. 1, 38, 77.

We seem entitled to the conclusion that these four 'manors' were little more than farms worked for the lord of Denbigh by hired labour; and that the nativi who might have worked them, so far from being depressed by the enforcement of servile labour on the demesne, had been released from the more irksome incidents of their status by the substitution of rents, or at least of money-dues, for their ancient customary services. To all seeming, then, the result of the English conquest had been not the importation of the English manorial economy, except as regards agricultural improvement, but the deliberate suppression of certain of its most characteristic features which had developed on tribal land during the time of the princes.

We must turn then to examine the acre-holdings on the scattered areas of escheat, in order to find the most obvious and the most varied examples of English tenures. The most honourably placed tenants were doubtless the holders by the service of castle-guard, some eleven of whom are entered in the Survey among the tenants at Lewenny.[2] All of these were Englishmen, originally enfeoffed by the Earl of Lincoln, with plots of land at Lewenny, Thloen, Kylkedyk, and Athlevaynan, varying in amount from the 15 acres of William Basket's wife to the 250 acres of William de Swynemor. The terms of the latter's tenure describe it as in fee by charter of the Earl of Lincoln by the service of castle-guard in time of war for 40 days at his own costs, with suit of court; and the rest are said to hold eodem modo, with the exception of three whose original holdings have been approved and two of them changed to life-estates. Elsewhere we learn that the service was performed at the Castle of Denbigh. It should further be noted that all these tenants paid, in addition to the service, annual money rents at the nominal rate of 2*d.* for 40 acres.

A number of other hereditary tenants are mentioned at different places in the Survey, with more or less indefinite specifications of their tenure. Four Englishmen, one at Segroit, one at Penmaen, and two at Lassemayn, are said to hold in feodo.[1] Ten others, two at Lassemayn and eight at Lewenny, are said to hold hereditarie.[2] With the exception of the heir of Richard de Hoylond, whose only service in return for 49 acres at Lassemayn is to render annually two pairs of gloves, all the above hold for money rents at rates so varied as to reveal no principle of assessment and no indications of the quality of the tenure: William Curteys' 120 acres in Segroit Park are valued at £6, while the heirs of Richard Banaster pay but 6*d.* for 48 acres at Lassemayn. But Welshmen are also found holding in feodo: a group of heirs of a progeny hold all the escheat of Escorebrithl quit of all dues by charter of the Earl of Lincoln, in exchange for their patrimony elsewhere;[3] another group, and also an individual Welshman, hold acres at Lassemayn by the honourable payment of pairs of gilt spurs.[4]

One other example of the recognized hereditary tenures of English feudalism is to be found at Denbigh, where the burgesses of the borough founded by Henry de Lacy hold the whole borough and vill of Denbigh by fee-farm tenure at a yearly render of £24, with the added obligation to provide for ever a chaplain to celebrate in the Chapel of Denbigh for the souls of the lord, his ancestors and heirs.[5]

Among the hereditary tenures may also be classified the less familiar form of tenure per relevium, or pro relevio, which is frequently mentioned in the text of the Survey. Nearly a hundred instances can be counted among the vills of the commotes of Kaymergh and Yssalet where Englishmen hold parcels of acres for money rents by this tenure, no fewer than 80 holding in this way 905 acres in the park of Segroit.[1] Further cases occur outside those commotes at Llanrwst (Thlan Ourost), where Welshmen hold acres and Englishmen burgages pro relevio,[2] and also at Hendregeda, where some of the escheat—it is not at all clear how much—is held by the same tenure.[3] We have not enough evidence to admit of the precise definition of tenure per relevium. Its conditions were evidently well understood and had not to be reduced to a formal contract per cartam. It is contrasted with and was clearly much superior to the precarious tenure at will: this is seen at Llanrwst, where the Welsh burgesses hold at will, while the more privileged English hold their burgages 'by relief';[4] some, too, of the Welsh acre-holders there seem to be claiming tenure by relief in contrast with the more precarious position of their fellows. From these fragments of evidence, and from the fact that these 'relief' holdings were almost always in English hands, it may be concluded that tenure per relevium was a privileged tenure conferring on the tenant an hereditary interest in his land, perpetual no doubt, but conditional on the payment of a fine or relief to the lord by the heir of the tenant at his incoming.

Three cognate varieties of tenure may be briefly noticed here. Examples of life interests occur; two, already mentioned, at Lewenny among the tenants by castle-guard, and one at Eryvyot,[5] where Eignon ap Atha holds 58 acres freed by charter from the original rent of 15*s*. 4*d*. ad terminum vite sue. Two examples, again, are found of the term of years. At Arquedelok there are ten English tenants, one of them the extentor himself, Hugh de Beckele, each holding 31 acres, 24 cows and a bull for the yearly rent 73*s*. 4*d*. ad terminum annorum, on condition of restoring to the lord the land and the beasts at the end of the term.[1] At Hendregeda, Dionisius de Wathe, one of the above ten, also holds 6 acres of meadow for a term of years by charter of the lord.[2] Finally, a few cases occur of tenants who have been granted holdings for one year only. In nearly every case such holdings have been abandoned for one cause or another by the previous tenant, and his place is temporarily filled by a neighbour, on the old terms. Such a substitute is said to hold hoc anno per Escaetorem; but there are hardly more than six instances of such tenure throughout the text.

Hitherto we have been concerned with tenurial interests created, in nearly every case, in favour of English tenants of the Denbigh escheats. It is otherwise as regards a large class of tenures at will, ad voluntatem domini, where, with very few exceptions, the rights of Welsh holders solely are involved. How far this precarious tenure at will can be said to have created an interest for the holder is doubtful. It may have involved well-understood conditions which, if satisfied, would in course of time have endowed the tenant with some customary title to his land. Or again, it may be but a general term for a variety of cases which left particular contingencies to be specified. At any rate, there is no uniformity in the nature of the holdings which are found under this tenure in the Survey. The majority are, no doubt, simple acre-plots of escheat in the hands of individuals. But we find also entire hamlets held at will, either by a single progeny as at Hendrenedoye,[3] or by individuals as at Dynerth in Loydcoyd.[4] So too, not only places (placee) and curtilages are thus held, but burgages as at Llanrwst and Erethlyn,[5] fractional shares in mills as at Tathloyn,[6] and the demesne of 'manors' as at Kilforn, Astret Oweyn, and Dynorbyn.[7] The specification of the tenure also varies in different cases. Generally it is simply ad voluntatem or ad voluntatem domini, but the escheat of Mathebrut is held ad voluntatem domini de anno in annum[8]—which may indeed be the implied condition in all other cases; at Penmaen and Lassemayn the balance of the escheat is held by the priodors in common quamdiu domino placuerit;[1] while at Llanrwst four Welshman pay pro libertate habendi ad voluntatem domini.[2]

The last-mentioned case seems to show that tenure at will might well be preferred to the ordinary system of rack-rents, on which most of the escheat was farmed out. All the tenures here discussed, be it remembered, represent but a small proportion of the total area of escheats accruing to the lord, which, where no particular conditions of tenure are specified, were simply let to individuals acre by acre for the value of the land, which value it was the object of these periodic extents to maintain at the highest figure. We may perhaps be justified in distinguishing from this usual system the tenure ad firmam, or tenure at a fixed ferm under conditions, not elastic, but settled by contract once for all. The great majority of the mills or escheated shares in the mills were held ad firmam, as also were the tolls and the dovecot at Abergele.[3] So too was the hamlet of Hendrenedoye already mentioned, until the day when the lord's extentor came and cast upon it and its farmers a too precise and yet persuasive eye.[4]

There have lastly to be considered, as belonging to a different category, a number of instances of the holding of bovates on the escheated areas. Unfortunately, however, no reference is sufficiently detailed or explicit to tell us what most we should have wished to know about them. Almost the only generalization that can be made with certainty is that the bovate of this extent normally contained ten acres, was worth 40*d.* a year, and was in the hands of an English tenant, and even to this there are reservations to be made. If we attempt to count up the number of bovates, we can reach (for the moment) a total of fifty-two, of which fifteen were held at the time of the Survey for money-rents, one had been held quit of rent since the Earl of Lincoln's day, and the remainder were held rent-free in connexion with burgage tenements in the borough of Denbigh.

[4] f. 243. It may here be noted that tenure per cartam or per scriptum is not a distinct tenure, but a general form covering any of the varieties of tenure above discussed, in which the conditions are reduced to a written contract by charter. Acre-holdings, bovates, exchanges, and estates, hereditary, for terms, or for life, could all be held per cartam; for a peculiar example see f. 65. Generally tenure per cartam is a distinguishing feature of holdings by Englishmen.

The case of the fifteen is clear enough so far as the text goes: four were at Kilforn in the hands of two tenants, three were held at Astret Canon by three tenants, and eight at Lewenny by eight tenants.[1] The last-named eight are said to be held by charter, but whether of the existing or the former lord does not appear; at any rate they are distinct from the single bovate at the same place which is specified as being held rent-free by charter of the Earl of Lincoln.[2] With regard to the remaining thirty-six bovates, a number of difficulties present themselves. Their mention in connexion with burgage tenements at Denbigh leads one naturally to identify them with the bovates which Henry de Lacy is known to have granted to the first burgesses of Denbigh at the institution of the borough. His charter[3] specifies thirty-four bovates, namely, twenty-four in Lewenny, seven in Astret Canon, and one each in Kilforn, Wigfair, and Beryn. The thirty-six bovates mentioned by the present Survey as connected with burgages at Denbigh comprise 27½ bovates at Lewenny,[4] three each at Segroit and Astret Canon,[5] one each at Kilforn and Beryn, and half a bovate at Wickewere.[6] Of these, three of the Lewenny bovates and the three at Segroit appear to have been of recent creation, so that the discrepancy between the two lists seems to be very nearly accounted for. But all attempts to complete the identification and to explain the relation between the bovates and the burgages are frustrated by the ambiguous wording of the text of the Survey, which makes it appear in almost every case that the allocation of the bovates to Denbigh and the release of them from rent was quite a recent arrangement made by the existing lord, William de Montacute. It certainly sheds no light upon the difficulty to be told further that 6½ of the bovates, viz. that at Beryn, the half-bovate at Wickewere, and five of those at Astret Canon, had formerly been entered by mistake in the Book of Rents[7]

[7] The Rentale or Liber Redditualis, so frequently mentioned in the text, was the register of rents actually received from the tenants of the Honour at the usual terms; it should be carefully distinguished from the Extenta, which drew up a potential assessment to which the receipts as entered in the Rentale might or might not conform.

under the rents of Lewenny. Nor, again, are matters simplified by the additional information that William de Montacute, over and above all the allocations before mentioned, granted to 24 burgesses of Denbigh 480 acres of the Forest of Arquedelok pro xxiiij. bovatis videlicet cuilibet eorum xx. acras ad unam bovatam.[1] If this is not the negotiation of an exchange, it means the creation of a number of new 20-acre bovates, whereby our original total of 52 is increased to 76 and the original 10-acre average is done away. In that case, the remarkable fact that Montacute should have at once assarted half the forest which had only just been made by his predecessor can only be explained by some such hypothesis as that an unexpected growth of the new borough at Denbigh made necessary the provision of further endowment for burgage tenements. We should not, indeed, be surprised to find that all the bovates mentioned in the Survey were at the time, or once had been, in some way attached to burgage holdings in one or other of the urban settlements of the Honour. We are at a loss for any other suggestion which would account for the formal retention of a tenurial unit which had long lost its original agricultural significance, and was fast losing uniformity as a standard of area and of value.

We may conclude this section by giving some figures to show the proportion of escheat granted respectively to English and Welsh tenants in the five commotes to hold of the new lord. This would seem to furnish a rough indication of the treatment received by the old inhabitants and the new settlers. Excluding the urban settlements from the calculations, we find that in Kaymergh the English received 1,880 acres of the escheat, the Welsh 500 acres; in Yssalet, the English received 1,780 acres and the Welsh 1,540 acres; in Ughalet, the English 220 acres (almost all of which was at Arquedelok), the Welsh 720 acres; in Ysdulas, the English 330 acres (mainly at Hendregeda and Abergele), the Welsh 1,850 acres; and in Ughdulas, the English received 5 acres and the Welsh 1,700 acres. The figures show clearly enough that English influence, from being predominant in Kaymergh and strong in Yssalet, declined rapidly in the more western commotes of Ughalet and Ysdulas, and was almost non-existent in the remote Ughdulas. Whereas in Kaymergh only one vill, Postu, remained exclusively in Welsh hands, in Ughdulas no English are to be found anywhere except at Llanrwst. Again, in Yssalet there are seven exclusively English centres, but in Ughalet only one, and in Ysdulas none; whereas the exclusively Welsh vills increase in number from six in Yssalet to twelve in Ysdulas and sixteen in Ughalet.

We should not expect economic upheavals or the sudden introduction of new tenurial arrangements in regions where the native population remained so undisturbed as in the three western commotes of the Honour of Denbigh. Hence the importance of the inclusion of those regions in a fourteenth-century Survey alongside of others where more familiar conditions were beginning to prevail. For we are thereby enabled to measure both the rapidity and the thoroughness with which a conquest involving the clash of two diverse civilizations was followed by social and economic change.

THE URBAN POPULATION

By the side of the rural and agricultural institutions of the greater part of the Honour of Denbigh, showing in many points Welsh tribal customs under modification by English law and polity, certain urban settlements need consideration. The two larger organizations of Denbigh and Abergele will be discussed later, after a brief notice of the smaller organizations. At Erethlyn [1] there are six burgage tenements held at will by four Welshmen at a total annual rent of 14*s.* 4*d.* At Thlan Ourost [2] (Llanrwst) there are twenty-one burgage tenenements paying an annual rent of 57*s.*; one worth 10*s.* a year is vacant, two are held by an Englishman, William Curteys, per relevium at a rent of 3*s.*, three by two Welshmen on the same tenure at a rent of 11*s.* 8*d.*, ten by four Welshmen, at will, at a rent of 21*s.* 4*d.*, and five more by two Welshmen at a rent of 11*s.*, with no specification as to tenure. There are also three 'places' at an equal rent of 4*s.* each. At Lewenny [3] there is a certain hamlet called New Borough. The holdings are not described as containing so many acres, but as consisting of 'one place', 'two places', 'three places', plus so many perches, generally about twenty. This suggests that a defined piece of land had been cut up into twelve equal portions, and that a few perches of the adjoining land had been, where necessary, added to these holdings, probably as kitchen-gardens. This symmetrical division of a plot of land as the foundation of an urban district resembles the first steps in the arrangement carried out in 1215 and later years at Eynsham (Oxon.).[1] And in each case the later development of the incipient borough followed much the same lines. Thus the small urban settlement of twelve holdings in the New Borough of Lewenny would gradually gather strength and economic coherence until it received a charter from the lord of the Honour, with its franchises limited to the lands in the lord's power; ultimately it would become a borough by royal charter, having liberties and free customs valid through all the dominions of the king.

The township of Denbigh consisted in the time of the Welsh princes of two gavells, 'Rethe' and 'Caythe', i.e. free and bond.[2] The former was divided into six sub-gavells, and the latter into three, containing in all an area of 818 acres 3 roods.[3] On the highest part of the hill, which rises some 200 feet above the river, Henry de Lacy had built a large and strong castle, and had fortified what is called in this Extent 'the township of the borough within the walls', containing 9 acres 2 roods 7 perches.[4] These figures can only refer to the actual enceinte of the castle. Beyond this was 'the outer vill without the walls', containing 57 acres 1 rood 8 perches. Both these areas (excluding the castle, quod non extenditur propter magnam eius reprisam[5]) were held in fee-farm of William de Montacute by 'the burgesses of the township within the walls' at an annual rent of £24, and subject to the duty of providing a chaplain, in the chapel of Denbigh, to pray for the lord and his ancestors and successors for ever.[6] Though liable to an undivided rent, the two portions Burgus infra muros and Villa mercatoria extra muros are clearly distinguished; and the origin of this distinction must be sought in the early history of the town.

Having built his castle, and built (or, at any rate, planned) the houses within the walls, Henry de Lacy provided for its defence and good order by granting a charter.[1] As to its date no indication can be derived from the names of the witnesses, among whom are 'Monsire Johan Grey' (second Lord Grey of Wilton, 1268–1323), 'Sire Johan Dargentyn et Sire Robert de Shirlaund, chivalers' (the last probably a Grey also), as well as two Welshmen, Gronou Vacchan and Griffri ap Rees. The charter is addressed generally and states that the earl has granted to 29 burgesses 37 burgage tenements in Denbigh, 34 curtilages in Denbigh, and 22 bovates in Lewenny, to 7 more burgesses 7 burgage tenements in Denbigh, 7 curtilages in Denbigh, and 7 bovates in Astret Canon, and to 3 burgesses 3 burgage tenements in Denbigh, 3 curtilages in Denbigh, and a bovate each respectively in Kilforn, Wigfair, and Berain, while two other tenants are granted a bovate each in Lewenny. Only one grantee is a Welshman, William fitz Griffri, but the three daughters of Eynon de Ludlow hold a bovate in Lewenny. Each burgage tenement is liable to provide a man for castle-guard in Denbigh and to pay a penny at Christmas for hous-gable[2] and 40 pence for each bovate per annum.[3] The relief in each case is one year's rent. Neglect of service or failure to pay the rents will involve forfeiture of the tenements to the lord. The burgesses are to have housebote and haybote in the wood called Cardlewenny by view of the lord's foresters. They are to have common of pasture for their own beasts levant and couchant within the town in the said wood, in common with the men of Lewenny, after hay and corn are carried, and they are to be free from pannage dues from Michaelmas to Martinmas. They are to grind their corn at the lord's mills of Denbigh and Astret al vintisme vassel. Those who have not their own ovens are to bake at the lord's oven within the town. They are to be free of toll and stallage throughout all the earl's lands in Wales and

England, and are to have the attachment of burgesses within the town together with ward of the prison, 'saving to us and to our heirs the pleas, amercements, ransoms, and "le Juyse", and all things that appertain thereto.' This charter is believed to be unique among English (or Welsh) documents in its specification of the names of all the burgage tenants and of their tenements, its purpose being rather to define the rights and duties of individuals than to regulate their corporate action.[1]

The castle of Denbigh was the point from which the king's lieutenant had to defend the marches of Flint and Cheshire,[2] and at a later period it was so important that 'Monsire de Rutland, with 30 men-at-arms and 120 archers, kept Denbigh at the annual expense of £1,672 18*s.* 4*d.*'[3] That the share of the unfortunate burgesses in the chances of war was far from pleasant is shown by an undated petition addressed, apparently, to Richard II. The king's poor lieges, the burgesses and fortyns of Denbigh join in a humble prayer that whereas they have for the past four years at their own charge kept watch and ward of the town without any reinforcement of men or wages, and have often been robbed and harried by the rebels there, and though the king has under signet and privy seal often promised aid, it has not come, therefore they pray that sufficient succour of men-at-arms and archers be sent before the Feast of All Saints, otherwise the town will be lost.[4]

To burgesses subject to great risks in the interests of his lieutenant and of himself, Edward I did not make a very generous grant of franchises in his charter granted at Northampton on August 28, 1290.[5] This charter is in rather an exceptional form. It is addressed 'to all the king's bailiffs and lieges', and notifies that the king has granted to the Earl of Lincoln that all his 'men'[1] now or hereafter inhabiting his vill of Denbigh be quit of all toll, stallage, payage, pannage, murage, pontage, and passage, &c., through all the earl's territories formerly belonging to the King of Wales, and also through the counties of Chester, Salop, Stafford, Gloucester, Worcester, and Hereford. The charter of 1332[2] granted to the town of Denbigh exemption for the inhabitants from all such tolls through all the kingdom and the king's dominions. The inquisition on the death of Henry de Lacy[3] treated the whole of the burgage tenements as equal, each paying 4*d.* per annum.

In the present Extent we have no direct information as to the number of burgesses within the township of Denbigh; but we have particulars as to certain bovates at Lewenny.[4] One of these formerly held by Henry de Byllyng' Iunior has been assigned to Thomas the Smith[5] to his burgage in Denbigh; and twenty-four and a half others which used to render £4 8*s.* 4*d.* have been assigned to 'divers burgesses within the walls to be held quit with their burgages there'. Richard de Soresworth seems to be the one survivor of the burgesses mentioned in Henry de Lacy's original charter: he now holds[6] for the term of his life fourscore acres in Lewenny, rendering 4*d.* annually at Christmas, but he also owes suit of court and castle-guard in time of war for forty days at his own charges. He no doubt still held in addition 'one burgage within the walls and one curtilage without the walls', which were mentioned as his in Henry de Lacy's charter. The number of tenants at Lewenny liable for castle-guard[7] was eleven in 1334; the names of several of the tenants indicate that they were descendants of the original burgesses mentioned in Henry de Lacy's charter. It is likely that these preferred to maintain the old relation and liability to military service, while the increase in the amount of rent paid by the burgesses for the borough suggests that the others had tried to compound for some at least of their military duties. The other obligations of the charter no doubt still existed; and an examination of the names shows strict observance of the condition that Englishmen only were lawful 'assigns' of a burgess. The villa mercatoria without the walls had no doubt sprung up on the curtilages of the burgesses, and, with the fair, was now a source of income to them, as we do not find it 'extended' among the lord's revenues.

[1] If this charter is later than that of the Earl of Lincoln, as Williams assumes, it might have been expected that the term 'burgenses' would have been used. The term 'homines' suggests that they were dependants without many rights. In the Charter of Henry II to William, Earl of Albemarle (J. R. Doyle, Town and Port of Hedon, App., p. 3), the men of Hedon who have hitherto been the lord's burgesses become the king's burgesses, holding 'freely and quietly in free burgage, as the king's burgesses of York or Lincoln'.

The town of Abergele is situated within two miles of the coast, and is about twelve miles in a north-westerly direction from Denbigh, and easily visible thence. As Denbigh centres round its castle, so Abergele centres round its peel. We have no information as to any charter of incorporation. From the Inquisition post mortem held in 1311, on the death of Henry de Lacy, it appears[1] that the earl had there a merchant town, wherein are twenty-four burgesses who hold twenty-four burgages and render yearly 5*s.* 3*d.* They also hold tenements outside the borough (forinseca tenementa) for which they render £8. There is a rent of assize of a mill, 30*s.*; and the tolls there are worth 30*s.* a year, and are let out at farm. There is a fair worth 28*s.* 4½*d.* a year. Further, the earl had there the advowson of a church called Kikedok,[2] worth 10 marks a year; and they say that the pleas and perquisites of court are worth there 60*s.* yearly. The Survey[3] tells us much of the Welsh tenants of this township; and then describes the tenants of the burgages, which have now risen in number to twenty-nine, each rendering a penny at Christmas, as did Henry de Lacy's original burgages of Denbigh. It may be noted that a Welshman, Iorwerth ap Gruffuth, holds two and a half burgages, and another Welshman, Llewelyn ap Ph', held one. There are, besides, eight 'places' in the holding of various tenants (one obviously a Welshman). The rents vary so much that they can hardly be the result of partitioning a solid block of land equally among a class of tenants, as in the case of the tenants at Eynsham. It might even be argued that the occupiers were squatters. We read : una placea quam Dionisius de Wath' tenuit reddendo per annum iij.d. capta est in manum domini quia iacet ante portam Peli.[1] It is hardly likely that the lord's steward would deliberately have given Denis a lease that interfered so materially with the use of the peel-tower ; probably he had simply taken possession of the land during some period of confusion, by building a house, under Welsh law, between sunset and dawn.

The Survey further shows that at Abergele there had grown up a large occupying tenantry in other parts of the township, paying nearly 15 per cent. below the proper rent, on erroneous measurements or a wrong valuation of their land. The market toll and issues of the fair had indeed risen from 58*s.* 4½*d.* to a sum that justified Denis de Wath' in farming them at £8 10*s.* yearly. The escheat of Abergele was divided into two sections, the acre Burgensium (or Anglicorum) and the acre Wallensium. Possibly the reason of this was a difference in methods of tillage : or it may only have been aimed to prevent inconveniences from diversity of language. It will be observed that, whatever the inconveniences, many of the tenants held in both sections. A similar state of affairs existed elsewhere. A petition of the burgesses of Conway[2] in 1305 stated that six villani of the prince held twenty acres of land in the midst of the lands of the burgesses, and prayed that they might be removed, and the lands delivered and rented to the burgesses. Answer was made ' that the justices do thereof as of other villani of the hamlets '. Beside the arable escheats there remained in the lord's hands the wood on the hills[3] (30 acres 2 roods 9 perches) and 300 acres 2 roods 2 perches in the marsh, from which the lord got no annual profit, save that the whole township rendered to the lord, for the herbage of their beasts in the same, thirty shillings yearly. All tenants were obliged to grind at the lord's mill. This produced a total rent of 66*s.* 8*d.*, half of which belonged to the progeny of Eden' Vaghan. The mill, in this case, was a water-mill, situate on the boundary between the township of Llandulas and Abergele.

NOTE ON THE MSS.

THREE important manuscript copies of the Denbigh Extent of 1334 are extant, but their inter-relation is not easy to determine; nor is it certain whether there lies behind them an earlier original which embodied in a single draft the returns of the surveyors.

The MS. which now lies in the Maitland Library at All Souls College, Oxford, is that from which the present text is taken. It is a volume dating from the latter half of the fourteenth century, retaining its original binding, of which the leaves measure $12\frac{3}{4}'' \times 8\frac{1}{2}''$. Four different hands are traceable: the first extends to the words in posterum, f. 169; the second continues thence to the end of f. 189; the third carries on the text to the end of f. 261, and the fourth from that point to the end. In the footnotes to the text below this MS. is denominated M.

A very valuable copy is preserved in the Public Record Office among the Land Revenue Records (Miscellaneous Books, No. 232). This is a folio volume containing eighty-two leaves of manuscript originally measuring $14\frac{1}{2}'' \times 10''$, but now re-mounted and re-bound. It is written throughout in a single and very regular hand of the fourteenth century, but it has lost its opening folios, and begins imperfectly at the end of f. 3 of the text below; its first four and last four leaves are also somewhat worn. This MS. is here denominated L.

The Harleian MS. No. 3632, here denominated H, is of less account than either of the above. It is a volume (re-bound) of eighty leaves of manuscript, measuring $13\frac{1}{2}'' \times 10\frac{1}{4}''$, written in a hand of the early fifteenth century, which changes imperceptibly as it proceeds, but is doubtless that of a single scribe; the leaves are somewhat stained and some of the marginal entries have been partly cut away. In addition to these defects, the text of this MS. is incomplete, for not only does it omit several folios contained in M and L (ff. 235–244, below), but the greater part of the description of the commote of Ughdulas is missing (from f. 254, below, to the end). The volume appears to have lost its final pages, but, according to a memorandum at the end, the loss must be one of old standing.

One other manuscript of the Survey, also preserved among the Land Revenue Records (Miscellaneous Books, No. 248), deserves little more than mention. This is a copy on paper of L, in a sixteenth-century hand, but it lacks the opening folios, beginning at f. 8 of the text below. When necessary it is referred to here as LR.

The text of MS. M, accepted for the present edition, has been collated throughout with MSS. L and H, but it has not been thought advisable to encumber it with a profusion of variant readings. Only such readings have been annexed as may be useful for topographical or philological purposes, for indicating the relation of the MSS., or, of course, for supplementing or elucidating the principal text. One does not expect documents of the date and kind here presented to be drafted with the same neatness and precision as annals and records of an earlier period. But it must be confessed that the idiosyncracies of the three texts in the matter of spelling, grammar, and abbreviation have made the task of editing more than usually laborious. The chief difficulty has been in the case of proper names, where it was found impossible to be at once consistent in the extending of contracted forms and faithful to the astonishing variations of the manuscripts. The plan was therefore adopted of keeping the contractions in the text in all doubtful cases and leaving the Indexes to show the many variant forms. It has fortunately been possible to correct the proofs of the text directly from facsimiles of the original.

DOMINIUM DE DYNBIEGH'.

Extenta Castri et Honoris[a] de Dynbiegh' facta per Hugonem de Beckele[b] et per recognitionem tenencium singularum villatarum anno regni Regis Edwardi III post conquestum octavo.

In primis sciendum est quod dominium de Dynbiegh' continet duo cantreda et dimidium, videlicet cantred. de Ros[c] quod continet duo commota, videlicet commotum de Istulas et commotum de Ughdulas, item cantred. de Rowaynok' quod similiter continet duo commota, videlicet commotum de Ishalet et commotum de Ughalet, item dimidium cantred. consistit in vno commoto quod vocatur commotum de Kayneergh',[1] vnde primo fit extenta commoti de Keyneergh' eo quod est propius Anglie, deinde commoti de Ishalet, tercio commoti de Ughalet, quarto commoti de Istulas et quinto et vltimo de Ughdulas. [a] What came to be the Honour of Denbigh is mentioned, but briefly, in Domesday Book, p. 269 : it is reckoned as part of the county of Chester, and we are told that Robert of Rhuddlan holds Ros and Reveniov in fee of the King. It is 12 leagues in length and 4 in breadth : there is land for 20 ploughs ; but it is valued at only £12. All the rest of the land consists of woods and moors and it cannot be ploughed.

[b] He is mentioned on f. 196 as a tenant at Arquedelok, holding at a rent of 73*s.* 4*d.*, and on f. 235 at Abergele at a rent of 72*s.* 4½*d.* There is a Beckley in Oxfordshire and another in Sussex. It is important to note that he comes from England.

[e] The author of 'Husbandry', published in Miss Lamond's edition of Walter of Henley, p. 68, refers to various perches, of 18, 20, 22 or 24 feet, as well as to the perch of 16 feet. The death of Henry de Lacy (1311) was too recent to justify us in supposing that the explanation was mythical, and therefore it is probable that he did introduce arbitrary measurements in this case.

j Cf. f. 214. On ff. 68, 70 we find tenants called Hugh or Henry, &c., del Frith or de Fryth. One of the meanings of 'frith' given in the New English Dictionary is 'unused pasture land': this approaches nearest to the meaning of 'ffridd' in north and central Wales to-day, where it denotes enclosed land generally for pasture, below the uncultivated rough land on the mountain side; in most cases it is near the homestead, and is used for the flocks and cattle brought down in winter from the open mountain. In Denbighshire 'ffridd' forms part of the place-name of many farms which are generally on the mountain side about 400 ft. above sea level.

k The creation of new meadow land is clearly shown: its increased value 18*d*. per acre is very great.

[p] This assarted land was previously held of the communitas ville: this, which went back to ancient times, has now been replaced by the lord. Cf. f. 9 'communitas villate reddit' and f. 21 'tota villata tenet'; cf. ff. 16, 22. An excellent example of the recognition of a community, and even a community of villeins, as capable of holding land and even of making an exchange with the lord, is to be found at Brightwaltham at the end of the thirteenth century. Cf. Select Pleas in Manorial Courts (Selden Soc.), p. 172; Hist. MSS. Comm. Report, Middleton Collection (Cd. 5567), pp. 106, 109, and Vinogradoff, Growth of the Manor, p. 322 and note 29, p. 370.

[q] Cf. ff. 16, 18, 20. This court is an administrative body—a diminutive curia regis, as the latter was before it split up into its various sections.

[v] The 'vulgare dictum' is opposed in this case to the contention of the nativi. It would point to what is 'commonly said' in the place perhaps by tenants of the escheated lands, who may be supposed to take the lord's side in the matter. The faithful registration of the claims of the nativi is characteristic of the survey. The decision of the matter however is reserved for the council.

Et debet solvi ad Festa Pentecostes et Sancti Michaelis per equales porciones. Et si quis liber vel Nativus istius commoti quicumque fuerit decesserit intestatus dominus habebit medietatem omnium bonorum suorum si fuerit vxoratus preter blada que remanebunt Ragloto. Et si non fuerit vxoratus tunc dominus habebit omnia bona sua preter blada que remanebunt Ragloto et preter iura ecclesie &c.

Et sciendum quod Filius post mortem patris sui qui liber est dabit domino suo pro relevio[m] terre patris sui sive magis tenuerit sive minus x*s.* Et frater et nepos seu alii remociores hereditarii vsque ad tercium gradum et in tercio gradu dabunt pro eodem relevio xx*s.* Et extra tercium gradum non habent accionem ad hereditatem petendam, set est terra ad voluntatem domini tanquam escaeta. Set si dominus terram illam dimittere voluerit est citius dimittenda propinquiori de sanguine pro vero valore quam alicui extraneo. f. 43. Liberorum.

Filie vero liberorum si convicte fuerint super transgressionem luxurie vel adulterii dabunt pro leirwyto[73] x*s.* Et similiter vxores

[a] Two of the three parks, which contained nearly 700 standard acres, were 'enclosed with palings and ditches', so as to keep in the larger beasts of the chase, whose lairs would be in the thick and thorny underwood that was ripening for cutting, while wild-fowl frequented the alneti. On the launds in all three hares and smaller game would be hunted. The yearly cost (£9 10*s*. 0*d*.) of keeping up the enclosures and maintaining park-keepers is nearly 30 per cent. of the income.

[b] This was apparently let to tenants. The account of Kaymergh of 1330 (Min. Acc. 1182, m. 1) speaks of rents of lands in Lanassok 'existencium in manibus volencium'. In that account, too, there is no trace of labour services being rendered on the demesne. Cf. supra, f. 3, Kilforn.

Et sciendum quod temporibus Principum primo consistebat tota villata | de Dynbiegh' in duabus gavellis nativorum quarum vna gavella fuerat liberorum altera[84] et ideo vocabatur dicta gavella Wallice gavel Rethe,[d] quasi gavella libera, que postea divisa est in vj. gavellis de quibus respondetur in posterum. Et secunda gavella fuit de vilioribus et de pluribus servitutibus quam prima gavella, quapropter vocabatur Kaythe Wallice quasi gavella villica latine que postea divisa est in iij^bus^ gavellis de quibus similiter respondetur in posterum. Dynbeigh' forinsecum. f. 49.

De gavella Rethe que dividitur in vj. gavellis vt patet superius prima gavella vocatur gavel Was Patryk vnde Ithel ap Gron' Loyd, Yeuan et Eden' fratres eius tenent medietatem istius gavelle et habent excambium in Eryvyot redd. per annum in Ardreth'[e] pro omnimodis consuetudinibus ad term. [d] Cf. f. 112. This gavell had been one of free tenants; not only does the name survive, but the freeman's rate of relief and amobrage is paid by the tenants, who are however called nativi. There were no doubt other marks to distinguish them from the nativi of the second gavell, 'de vilioribus et de pluribus servitutibus,' hence called Caythe, i.e. 'villica'. ---

[q] Cf. ff. 88, 184, 185, 186, 187. This term Albadeth, which in the Harleian MS. is generally written Abbadeth, occurs only in this vill of Nanthyn Sanctorum, where it is paid by members of the progenies of Canon ap Lauwargh instead of Tung and Treth in the proportion of three to two respectively, and in the vill of Gwytherin, where it occurs also in connexion with the progenies of Canon ap Lauwargh and the tenants 'quorundam abbatum de progenie predicta'. In the Norwich Taxatio of 1254, 'Gwythrem et Nanclyn' are grouped together. The term is probably a perversion of Abbadreth, and it is difficult to resist the conclusion that it is connected with some ecclesiastical privilege or immunity.

[r] The sum paid should be 4*s.* 9½*d.*, and not 5*s.* 9½*d.*, as is clear from the amounts paid at the two terms, and from the total from the whole vill given on the next page.

[s] This probably means in the proportion paid by nativi, i. e. about half as much as was paid by a free tribesman. David and all the other tenants here are said to be 'priodarii'. This lower rate may also be due to some ecclesiastical privilege.

[c] This transaction is noteworthy. A certain Hoydylo ap Ith', to whom the rights of the progenies of Ith' ap Cadugan ap Ostreid had descended, mortgaged these rights to Prince Llewelyn ap Iorwerth, who handed the mortgage over to a lady friend Tanguestel Goch'; she in turn sold it to Canon ap Lauwargh, and his progenies still held the land, but it is alleged wrongly, for the right to it appertained to one who had died in war, and therefore his rights escheated to the lord. For a reference to Prince Llewelyn ap Iorwerth see f. 196.

Herbagium.

Et sic supersunt de proparte domini iiij^{xx}xij. acr. iij. rod. xix. pert. terre, bosci et vasti vnde dominus nullum capit annuale proficuum preter quod tota communitas ville reddit domino annuatim ad duos term. pred. pro inde herbagio x*s.* Et tamen si partite fuissent et extracte valeret quelibet acra ad appruandum ad minus iij*d.* vnde foret summa vltra dictum appruamentum xiij*s.* ij*d.* q.

Summa herbagii patet.

Et[33] sciendum quod tempore Principis solebat vnus stalo et vnus garcio Principis pasci ad domum cuiuslibet liberi non habentis tenentem aut eciam ad domum cuiuslibet tenentis liberorum et eciam ad domum cuiuslibet Nativi istius commoti, per vnum diem et vnam noctem, et valuit eorum pastus adinvicem[34] per diem et noctem secundum quod reperitur in vetere extenta ij*d.* ob. Tamen tunc non reddiderunt pro illis pastubus nisi quilibet eorum per annum j*d.* ad festum Exaltacionis Sancte Crucis, vnde ista consuetudo est talis quod si liber tenens habeat vnum tenentem vel plures tenentes tunc quilibet eorum reddet pro isto pastu j*d.* et tunc ipse liber erit inde quietus racione sui tenentis vel suorum tenencium. Et accidit iste pastus secundum maius et minus secundum quod plures illorum liberorum habuerint domos plures vel pauciores et eciam secundum quod ipsi liberi plures habuerint tenentes vel pauciores. Tamen anno Edwardi
f. 146. Regis | tercii post conquestum octavo fuerunt in isto commoto de huiusmodi liberis habentibus domos, prout superius patet super eorum capita, cxxvj. liberi. De quibus fuerunt xiij. liberi qui habuerunt inter se, tempore quo facta fuit examinacio per Extentorem de huiusmodi tenentibus liberorum, lxxiiij. tenentes. Et sic valuit iste pastus illo anno inter liberos et eorum tenentes xv*s.* vij*d.* Et inter nativos domini habentes domos fuerunt lvj. nativi, vt patet super eorum capita et in summis in singulis villatis, quorum pastus valet illo anno iiij*s.* viij*d.* De istis pastubus excipiendi sunt liberi tenentes de Wyryon Pythle et Wyryon Runon in Prees eo quod ipsi solvunt pro huiusmodi consuetudine in Ros Ughdulas. Tamen eorum tenentes in Prees sunt eiusdem condicionis vt ceteri &c. Et exceptis priodariis de Nanthyn Sanctorum.

Item [35] quilibet liber tenens non habens tenentes seu quilibet tenens liberorum ac eciam quilibet Nativus habens domum reddit pro pastu Lucrarii cum canibus term. pred. j*d.* et eciam pro pastu Penmackew et Waysion Baghein ob. eodem modo et ordine vt de pastu stalonis et garcionis superius, vnde pastus Lucrarii cum canibus valuit anno supradicto inter liberos et eorum tenentes cum tenentibus domini in Nanthyn Sanctorum xv*s.* ix*d.*, et inter nativos domini iiij*s.* viij*d.* Et accidit secundum maius et minus racione qua supra de pastu stalonis et garcionis.

Item [36] pastus Penmackew et Waission' Bagheyn valuit eodem anno inter liberos et eorum tenentes cum illis de Nanthyn Sanctorum vij*s.* x*d. ob.*, et inter nativos domini eodem anno ij*s.* iiij*d.* secundum quod assumatur erga nativos in sigulis * villatis per se. Et accidit iste pastus secundum maius et minus tam inter liberos quam inter nativos racione prenotata.

Item [37] omnes liberi et Nativi istius commoti solebant construere et sustinere sumptibus eorum apud Dynbiegh' pro Principe vnam aulam, vnam cameram cum gardroba et vnam capellam et eciam | vnam f. 147.
loteleriam et vnam pistrinam et eciam facere et sustinere sepes citra [38] Curiam Principis. Et nunc a tempore Comitis Lyncolnie arentantur eis iste consuetudines ita quod quilibet terram tenens sive fuerit liber sive nativus reddet [39] per annum ad festum Invencionis Sancte Crucis pro construccione domorum et sepium j*d.*, exceptis priodariis de Wyryon Pythle et Wyryon Runon in Prees qui nichil solvent pro illa consuetudine hic eo quod solvunt pro huiusmodi consuetudinibus in Ros Ughdulas, et exceptis priodariis de Nanthyn Sanctorum qui nullas faciunt tales consuetudines. Et fuerunt anno supradicto in isto commoto ciiij^{xx}j. liberi et lix. nativi terram tenentes qui debent pro huiusmodi construccione domorum solvere &c., vnde valet construccio domorum &c. inter liberos illo anno xv*s.* j*d.* et inter nativos prout assumatur in singulis villatis iiij*s.* xj*d.* Et accidit secundum maius et minus secundum quod fuerint plures tenentes vel pauciores.

Item [40] quilibet Nativus habens vnam carucam dabit domino vnam cranoc' avene vel viij*d.* per annum ad festum Nativitatis Sancti Iohannis Baptiste vt patet supra inter nativos de Lewenny, quod accidit secundum maius et minus prout fuerint plures eorum habentes carucas vel pauciores et qui minus habeat minus dabit secundum quantitatem quam habuerit in carucis. Et estimantur communibus annis inter eos xiiij. caruce quarum totidem cranoc' avene valent ix*s*. iiij*d*.

Et[41] quicumque nativorum fecerit seu emendaverit sepes &c. dabit domino primo die Maii j*d*. vt patet superius inter nativos de Lewenny. Et accidit ista consuetudo secundum maius et minus secundum quod plures eorum fecerint sepes vel pauciores, et licet habuerint boscum proprium nichilominus dabit illam consuetudinem. Et si non habuerint boscum proprium tunc habebit heybote[k] de communi bosco per liberacionem Forestariorum. Et estimatur illa consuetudo valere communibus annis ij*s*.

Et[42] dicunt omnes priodarii liberi et nativi quod invenient inter eos in communi sumptus duorum Forestariorum per annum videlicet quolibet die iij*d*., vnde solvunt pro pastu ij. Forestariorum in communi per annum iiij*li*. xj*s*. ad term. Pentecostes et Sancti Michaelis per equales porciones et colligitur per eorum catalla vt dicunt.

f. 148. De Pastu Satellitum.

Dicunt eciam quod debent inter eos pasci ij. satellites per annum ad pacem custodiendam assignatos seu servientes pacis vel satisfacient eis pro eorum pastubus secundum quod poterunt cum eis convenire. Tamen Nativi dicunt quod solvunt eis per annum pro eorum pastubus quilibet eorum iiij*d*. set hoc nolunt liberi fateri. Et istos pastus facit quilibet Preodarius habens domum sive fuerit liber sive Nativus et tam homines[l] Episcopi[43] quam alii. Et non extenditur eorum pastus hic quia pertinet ad firmam servientis pacis de qua dicendum est inferius.

De releviis.

Dicunt eciam quod filius liberi Preodarii post mortem patris sui dabit domino pro relevio suo antequam hereditatem suam possideat x*s*. Et frater aut nepos aut consanguineus infra tercium gradum et in tercio gradu dabit pro relevio suo post mortem antecessoris sui antequam eius hereditatem optineat xx*s*. Et vltra tercium gradum non est inter eos ius hereditarium set erit terra escaeta domini pro defectu heredum &c. Dicunt tamen quod si dominus terram illam dimittere voluerit, dimittenda est citius propinquiori de sanguine pro vero valore quam alicui extraneo. De relevio nativorum nichil dicunt hic quia satis exprimitur superius inter nativos de Lewenny.

De amobr'.

Dicunt eciam quod si filia liberi maritata fuerit vel eciam super fornicacione convicta fuerit, dabit domino pro mercheto seu leyrwito

[r] The tenants of the gavell Gwyrnewydd, i. e. of the 'new men', allege that they should not render hens and autumn-works here because they do not have their houses on this land, but in the gavell Ken Duy, where they also hold. The reply is that in any case they are liable for autumn-works, and they ought also to pay hens, because they ought to have at least one house here in which to take their meals. The rule laid down above is that the render must be made 'prout plures eorum habuerint domos, vel pauciores', which does not cover the case where there is no house at all.

[v] A parallel but incomplete account of these two vills appears in the Record of Carnarvon, pp. 90, 91. That text differs slightly in the spelling of the proper names and in the amounts of the sums interlined and summarized, and it breaks off in the middle of the account of the customs of Llysvaen, f. 285 below. The vills of Penmaen and Llysvaen formed part of the Principality lands, and in the time of Llewelyn were in the tenure of Grono ap Heilyn, Peckham's Register (Rolls Series), ii. 449. Grono appears to have been deprived of his rights, and the land passed to Robert le Crevequer under grant from the Crown, 7 Ed. I, Inq. post mortem 10 Edw. II, no. 21. By 1332 William de Montacute was in possession, Cal. Pat. Rolls, 1330–4, pp. 253, 357.
